Notes on Contributors

JO-MARIE CLAASSEN retired in 2001 as associate professor of Classics from the Department of Ancient Studies at the University of Stellenbosch. She is the author of Displaced Persons: The Literature of Exile from Cicero to Boethius (London and Madison 1999) and articles on topics ranging from Cicero to women and children in antiquity, the classical tradition, and didactics (including the use of computers in Latin teaching). She is at present engaged in reworking her many publications on Ovid's exile into a book, to be titled Ovid Revisited. People are her hobby.

ROBERT J. RABEL is professor of classics at the University of Kentucky. He is the author of Plot and Point of View in the Iliad (University of Michigan 1997) and editor of Approaches to Homer, Ancient and Modern (The Classical Press of Wales 2005). He has also published articles on Greek and Roman epic, Greek tragedy, and Greek history. Much of his recent work is concerned with classics and the cinema.

MARK STOHOLSKI is currently a visiting graduate student at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem. His interests include the construction of identity in Greco-Roman Egypt and the discourse of "magic" and "religion."

KEVIN TSAI is currently a visiting instructor in the Department of East Asian Studies at Oberlin College. Having published previously on classical Chinese fiction, he is working on a comparative project on Chinese, Greek, and Roman narratives.
