Ethan Allen in Love, House Beautiful

James Cihlar

Prairie Schooner, Volume 77, Number 1, Spring 2003, pp. 166-169 (Article)

Published by University of Nebraska Press

DOI: https://doi.org/10.1353/psg.2003.0006

For additional information about this article
https://muse.jhu.edu/article/41647
James Cihlar

Ethan Allen in Love

Lofty ideas. The living room space hides a multitude of details.

You have cleverly done everything. The crown molding was patched by hand.

Under the console table, near the splatback chair,

My cat tries to tell me something. We had lived in Hyde Park and wanted to increase the area of our primary living spaces.

The urine seeps between the tongue and groove of the tiger maple.

Something’s not working. Mikhail and his partner Vince Baroni like the raw look of steel.

A week of deaths, job tragedies revisited, and a cold bed have deposited me on the crosstown.

The pie safe comes in cherry or walnut. This display room’s walls are the same color as our bedroom.

Now let’s turn around and look at the en suite.

Sean Pratt, the host, defines the words Portico, Soldier Line, Parapet Walls.

There is no room for me here. My cat vomits on the wool rugs.

Old homes restored.
A Maryland couple has spent twenty years refurbishing their Victorian farmhouse.

A table saw sits in the center of the dining room.

House Beautiful

The lady across the hall smoked, and her cigarettes trailed through the plumbing into my apartment. As Bill and my sister and brother-in-law moved my stuff out of the Soviet-bloc-style apartments in Columbia Heights, Minnesota, she opened the door and yelled drunken gibberish at my sister.
Rita lived in a Wisconsin cabin outside the cities for three seasons of the year, with Binks, a pet turtle, and Chippie, a feral chipmunk. The sign outside Richmond reads,

The City Beautiful. Neither of these places was home. When Rita turned sixteen, our mother set fire to her sheets as Rita slept in bed. Through the flames, she sang to her, Happy Birthday to You, Happy Birthday to You.

Six blocks down from the Capitol in Nebraska, I once soaked in the tub with my headphones on, Paul in bed, the phallic deco building glowing in the flood lights as cars circled its base, men cruising in what was known as the fruit loop.

That was my apartment. Long story short: I later moved in with him, then I moved out.

Okay, back up: I came home from the party just noticing the rips in my shirt from the fight, and he had pushed the furniture in front of the doors so I couldn’t get in.

Later, by myself in my own apartment on thirteenth and “B” Street, I sat in front of the speckled mirror tiles, free Gevalia coffee-maker brewing its first pot of coffee, watching myself eat a delivered pizza, with Hiroshima, Mon Amour playing on a uhf channel. Believe it or not,
that was the closest to home I’d gotten by then.

So when I walk up to my house, now,
I will not hear the stereo from the street,
and when I walk inside
I will not listen for the note in her voice that betrays her drinking. Inside these doors, no one will have words they don’t say that build up over months and years,

and no one will ever leave me.

__Lynne Kuderko__

According to a Proverb

Two antelope walk together so that one can blow dust from the other’s eyes.
A man walks out onto the street. Perhaps he hurries, perhaps he is going to meet a woman, who may or may not be beautiful. A cloud in the sky.

Perhaps it will rain, perhaps there will be days of unrelenting sun.