Recent Angels

in memory of Tina Geraci

If you see her you will know her by the way she glances sideways as you pass. Keeps you at the edge of her sight. She is one who knows silence as native language, and fog as cloud fallen to earth to slow recent angels in their haste to rise. It is the breath of those who die young, who are alone late, and it is your silence, by which she knows you.

She has heard this silence before.
It is her name, not spoken, over and over and over again.

Days, she screams, cajoles, bitches, crawls on her belly like a snake. Nights, she throws herself onto the bed, muffles her sobs with down plumped in long-staple cotton.

The woman who lives here knows that the coin that buys houses, soap for the bath, clothes for her children, lapis lazuli necklaces matched with earrings set in gold, is paid by the hand that slaps her around.

 In the back, long-limbed boys row fragile shells over the lake. In the front, silver maples dwarf the colonnade, sway in light breezes, drop leaves in high wind, threaten to break with every storm.

The Memory Game

My father holds a stringer above a river – two catfish hang against the greasy sky. Photographic evidence he wasn't always ancient, he says.

I remember the suck of water as he rose up from the bathtub. I picture him up there, upstairs, thirty years younger, the dead moths inside the milky, glass bulb form a black, triangular heap of brittle wings above him. Through the door, clutching a terrycloth towel with one fist at his hip. He kicks my scattered toys at me, demanding a clear path. Sometimes lately, is it my imagination? A storm rises through a space
