A CKNOWLEDGMENTS

A book on the inexpressible is the work of many. To think and talk with scholars, teachers, students, friends and family for years on something both quiet and vivid has been a gift for me, a privilege, and a way of life. I thank my parents especially. My father gave wonder, his precision, and tireless care. He inhabits every sentence of Distancing English. My mother's openness, principles, and insights are close and present everywhere. In these years I have traveled distances and in place with my kind husband. My sister has kept her home open to us all, as has her family, Steve and Bonnie. Alice L. Wolper, Michael Whelan, Christine Gross-Loh, Rita Mall, Giah Rosenthal, Suhlle Ahn, and my parents-in-law have stayed with me through the course. I am in spirit and days indebted to them.

I am grateful for the generous support and assistance that I have received in many ways. I hope this work may in some measure live up to the company of those who have made it possible. I owe special appreciation and debt for this book to Barbara Johnson, Helen Vendler, and Rosanna Warren. I thank the Woodrow Wilson National Fellowship Foundation for early support, and in particular Robert F. Goheen of the Andrew W.

Mellon Fellowships in the Humanities, who encouraged and supported early phases of research. Grants and fellowships from Harvard University and The University of Hong Kong made research and travel to libraries possible at crucial points. Scholars and librarians helped locally and overseas at many institutions, including the Rare Book & Manuscript Library at The University of Pennsylvania; Widener Library and Houghton Library of Harvard University; The University of Hong Kong Libraries; and The Poetry Collection at the University of Buffalo. Work in progress has also appeared earlier: I am thankful to the editors of Wascana Review, The Dalhousie Review, ARIEL: A Review of International English Literature and "After Thirty Falls": New Essays on John Berryman. My ideas and research on a subject so vast and specific grew only with the spirit and suggestions of those who took time in the midst of enormous demands: Margreta de Grazia, James Engell, David Ferry, Marjorie Garber, Mark Halliday, Anthony Kubiak, David McWhirter, Derek Pearsall, Robert Pinsky, and Derek Walcott. I am fortunate to work with generous and welcoming colleagues in the School of English: Wendy Gan, Otto Heim, Elaine Ho, Christopher Hutton, Douglas Kerr, Q. S. Tong, and all in the School who have given me support and encouragement in research, teaching, and projects. Shirley Geok-lin Lim offered attentive and continuous guidance in research and plans from my first day on campus, and I am sincerely thankful. I also thank the Officers of The University of Hong Kong and the many contributing members of the university for their continuing and strong support of research and scholarship. For years, research assistants and coordinators, locally and overseas, including Sonal Srivastava and Mônica Zionede Hall, have given their energy, patience, and expertise to growing proposals and plans, and I am grateful to them. To Marina Ma and Fiona Chung, longstanding companions in research, projects, and poetry, I am each day grateful for continuing conversations and their remarkable visions. I warmly thank Senior Editor Sandy Crooms of The Ohio State University Press for her sustained support, fellowship, and guidance. I also sincerely thank Managing Editor Eugene O'Connor, as well as everyone at the press.
