I began this project as a graduate student at the University of Iowa more than a decade ago. A travel grant from the Stanley Foundation of the University of Iowa, the Prange Dissertation Fellowship awarded by the University of Iowa Department of History, and the Seashore Dissertation Fellowship of the Graduate College of the University of Iowa supported me in gathering my materials and in writing. The invaluable counsel and friendship of Jeff Cox is with me still, and my prose and that of my students continue to improve due to his good-humored rigor. Iowa’s faculty provided me with many mentors who made my experience there such a wonderful one; their advice and friendship have lasted well past my years as a graduate student. Thanks especially to Susan Lawrence, Linda Kerber, Ken Cmiel, Leslie Schwalm, Sarah Hanley, Mac Rohrbaugh, Teresa Mangum, and Shel Stromquist. In the years since leaving Iowa, I have come to appreciate all the more Mary Strottman’s office support. I benefited tremendously from my fellow Iowa graduate students who read and commented on various papers, chapters, and complete drafts of the dissertation: Catherine Rymph, Charles Hawley, Kim Nielsen, Michael Hau, Doris Malkmus, Michelle Rhoades, Sara Kimble, Sharon Kennedy-Nolle, the participants in Susan Lawrence’s 1992 history of medicine seminar, where this project was born, and those in her 1997 summer seminar on the history of the body.

There is no greater advantage to a historian than finding good archivists and librarians. My great appreciation goes to those who helped with my research: Mary McInroy, Michael Levine-Clark, and others in the University of Iowa Government Publications Department; the reference librarians at the University of Iowa Main Library; the manuscript librarians at University College London Library; the archivists and staff at the West Sussex Records Office in Chichester, the East Sussex Record Office in Lewes, the Wakefield Headquarters of the West Yorkshire Archives Service, the Bradford District Archives, the Leeds District Archives, the Westminster City Archives, and the London Metropolitan Archives; and the librarians at the Bradford Central Library.

While I have been at the University of Colorado at Denver, I have had the good fortune to have Myra Rich as my chair, mentor, and friend. She has been an incredible support to my personal and professional well-being, providing a listening ear when needed, twice reading my manuscript in full, and opening up new ways for me to see my own work. All my history colleagues at UCD, especially Pam Laird, Michael Ducey, Jim Whiteside, and Mark Foster, have shared the process of pulling this book together, offering welcome advice and enthusiasm. At UCD, I have also profited from the comments and friendship of Brad Mudge, Gillian Silverman, Michelle Comstock, and Lionel Jensen. Students in my Gender, Science, and Medicine classes have been part of this endeavor, keeping my thinking on the issues fresh. Sue Sethney and work-study students did much of my copying and carrying, which I greatly appreciate. Tracey Limbaugh, Stacy Salz, John Gerlach, and especially Jennifer Purcell provided research assistance along the way. Leah Dillard and Stacy Salz helped this project by taking care of my daughter in the early days when I needed time to work.

I want to thank the North American Conference on British Studies and its regional affiliates for providing a place to get excellent feedback as I was working through the various stages of this book. The NACBS has given me colleagues and friends who have offered needed support and insight. The suggestions of anonymous reviewers of my journal articles, book chapters, and comprehensive review at UCD improved the clarity of my arguments, as well as pointing me to additional sources. Anna Clark, Paul Deslandes, Susie Steinbach, and Susan Thorne provided some of the most helpful criticisms in the process of revision. Jonathan Andrews and Anne Digby offered welcome comments on my work on women and insanity. As commentator and chair at a 2001 AHA session where I presented the core argument of my book, Lucinda Beier and Heather Munro Prescott were helpful resources for sharpening my analysis.

From the outset, working with The Ohio State University Press has been a pleasure. Rima Apple and Janet Golden, the series editors, have enthusiastically supported the project, and I appreciate their confidence. Heather Lee Miller and Eugene O’Connor have been helpful and encouraging contacts throughout the process of getting this book to publication. Madeleine Adams made copyediting as painless as possible; I thank her for her care and take all responsibility for the final product.
Acknowledgments

My dissertation turned into this book during a walk with Mitra Emad on a land co-op in Winona, Minnesota, when, in talking about women and bodies, I realized what it was I really wanted to say. I often think of her and the many friends who have offered love and encouragement, helped me keep perspective as my life has changed over the years this book grew, and touched this project in one way or another. Warm thanks go especially to Vinnie Antonelli, Bill and Stephanie Binns, Claire and Paul Bowers, Sierra Bruckner, Catherine Burnett, Charlie Cannon, Jill and Todd Cooper, Paul Deslandes, Julie Dewerth, Charles Hawley, Ari and Lesley Kelman, Miranda Lynch, Kim Nielsen, Minta Perez, Denis Provencher, Jennifer and Andres Ramirez, Amy Randall, Catherine Rymph, Susie Steinbach, Tara Tull, Lara Trubowitz, Ragna Urberg, Eric Vance and Shelly Thompson, and Lorraine Walsh.

The support from my family throughout the process of research, writing, revising, and revising again has been extraordinary. Ann and Michael Friedman, Bob and Anne Levine, Matt Levine, and numerous Clarks, Schieckels, Levines, Rosenblatts, and Friedmans have joined in my anxieties as I constructed this book and my excitement in seeing it done; they have sustained me in too many ways to mention. Finally, Michael Levine-Clark has shared the many stages of this project, as he has shared my life for more than fifteen years, offering thoughtful suggestions, humor, love, and back rubs. Isabel Dora reminds me each minute we are together of the importance of dancing, uncontrollable laughter, and sloppy kisses. Every day I treasure what they give me. This book is for them.

I want to thank Indiana University Press for permission to use material from my article “Engendering Relief: Women, Ablebodiedness, and the New Poor Law in Early Victorian England,” Journal of Women’s History 11, no. 4: 107–30, on which chapter 3 is largely based. Portions of chapter 7 have been drawn from my article “Dysfunctional Domesticity: Female Insanity and Family Relationships among the West Riding Poor in the Mid-Nineteenth Century,” Journal of Family History 25, no. 3: 341–61, as well as my chapter “‘Embarrassed Circumstances’: Gender, Poverty, and Insanity in the West Riding of England in the Mid-Victorian Years,” in the Clio Medica Volume Sex and Seclusion. Class and Custody. Perspectives on Gender and Class in the History of British and Irish Psychiatry, Jonathan Andrews and Anne Digby, eds. (Amsterdam: Rodopi, 2003). Sections of Part II have been previously published in “Testing the Reproductive Hypothesis; or what made working-class women sick in early Victorian London,” Women’s History Review 11, no. 2: 175–200.
