I was young then and did not know how difficult it is for Western man to understand the dream-heavy classical soul. They are so far apart. The god of superlative shape has been replaced by the god of superlative force and between the two conceptions there is all space.

—Eric Ambler, Journey into Fear

Expressing their thoughts in words of which they are not the masters, enclosing them in verbal forms whose historical dimensions they are unaware of, men believe that their speech is their servant and do not realize that they are submitting themselves to its demands.

—Michel Foucault, Les mots et les choses

It may always be asserted that determinant paths must exist between the slave system characteristic of Greek society and the miracle of geometry, that the appearance of the applied sciences from the neo-classical era on must be conditioned in various ways by the mercantile economy of modern Europe, and so on. It can be asserted. It is correct to do so. That does not change the fact that the outline of these paths, the detailed description of such conditions is non-existent. The matter has perhaps been logically demonstrated, it has not been shown.

—Michel Serres, “Les sciences”
