SPEAKMAPLE

When there was town here I sprouted. As the humans bound a baby, dropped it to the freezing river, I knew only that the child levitated, lucent in some quick vein
of the air's dark sugar.
Now pheasants stitch the edge of terrain, the pagan wheat cast beneath itself by sky.
My leaves pause around me, brittle boats unanchored to the seething winds.
Loose stretches of cloud ripple like banners of a bloodrich city overhead. I place my mark on the screech owl, the vole, every heart under my motion, though the river rules this place—bones nestled in the alleys of its trout-flashed bottom—and I touch the names of arrows all through this one-eyed sleep.
