HIBERNACULA

A scrap of river glints its one long diamond of sleep and the bear turns outward, believing the water full of mirrors.

Buoyant as stars, his paws search the slip and heft of rock and my hands stroll the bed like minstrels, kneeling now and then to clench the sheets.
The house-scent carries over the hills, downstream the moon burns its coral stuffing in the river glass.

Into the woods the bear becomes darkness hedged by darkness, an undoing of pines into their own dominion. Awake, my hands rear up, cut and bruised on slate, skittish as a team of horses catching the scent of an animal that approaches, searching out a lair.
