HELMET IN THE GLADE

I looked beneath:
grass kept the head's impression.
The water I stooped to was once muscle, organ, and the body gone missing watched everywhere: mistook for shackles and coal the feral brood of roaches bursting from the thicket I pushed blindly through.
My foot gave a knock on that armor meant for rough while the alder bed I left jumped behind me in the wind.
Slow miles of chase and hunger in the wooded heaven and I'll never know who turned the other sick.
