ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

I do not know for sure where a book begins and ends. I know I cannot quite count the steps that took me here and acknowledge all the extraordinary mentors (Michele Marchetto and Francesco Casetti, being the first two), friends, and colleagues I have had throughout the years who have encouraged my curiosity and have inspired the style of my inquiries. I am particularly grateful to my professors at New York University who got me really started: the incomparable Bob Stam who very early on treated me like his peer, Anna McCarthy, Ed Guerrero, and Dana Polan. There are years of close conversations with Michael Gillespie which, even though not directly reflected here, have made it possible for me to even think about this type of scholarship; at the very least, the question “what is the blackness of black cinema” might have started it all.

This book is the result of a series of questions that lingered after the completion of my dissertation and were provoked by many people and circumstances along the way. My current and past advisees Drew Ayers, Michele Beverly, Kris Cannon, Melanie McDougald, and Chip Linscott have pushed this work toward deeper questions because of the bold inquiries they are developing in their work. I am grateful for the exchange and I look forward to more work together.

This project has benefited from several conversations with my colleague Jennifer Barker, whom I met as I was developing the questions that led to this book. She has changed the way I think about a lot of this. I never thought I could write about the body until she came to the Department of Communication at Georgia State University and made me immediately desire to do so. She made me mind all senses and made me want to look closer than anyone I know. Angelo Restivo has always had tremendous faith in me; I value his subtle comments, his understated brilliance, and his unique personality; Greg Smith has generously read several iterations of my attempts to explain this project and has cheered me on throughout; Nate Atkinson arrived at the tale end but was wonderfully supportive and always collected; my department chair, David Cheshier, has always demonstrated an extraordinary and unwavering support and endless generosity. I owe thanks to the many colleagues in the Department of Communication at Georgia State who have secured funding to help me out with the writing process. The incomparable Nedda Ahmed has helped with copyright clearance and made my life so much easier in more ways that I can list: Tony and Rahna Carusi gave me their readership, their intelligence, and friendship in scholarly things, and many more.

I want to thank my first set of colleagues at Ohio University, especially Marina Peterson and Andrea Frohne for “playing sports” together, and my first two advisees, Shannon Harry and Chip Linscott, for growing up together.

Thanks to the anonymous manuscript reader and to Nicole Fleetwood for her careful and passionate responses to what I was trying to do. Her suggestions have made this work so much stronger. Vinicius Navarro and Jeff Bennett read early drafts of this manuscript and made extremely supportive and gracious observations. I admire their courage in dealing with work in progress and I deeply appreciate their time and generosity.

This work has benefitted from numerous other conversations, with Ed-die Chambers, for example, and Keith Harris who has the unique ability to disappear and then suddenly come to the rescue. Meaghan Sutherland and Brian Price have let me consistently overreach at their inimitable World Picture Conference, where I tried out a lot of this material, and offered me invaluable opportunities to discuss my work; and Bishnupriya Ghosh and Bhaskar Sarkar, whom I met there, have always made caring, stimulating, and constructive comments.

There are a number of friends who should be credited with keeping me sane and sometimes allowing me to get away from this all: Danielle and the whole Mikells clan, the mothers and fathers who have helped with childcare (Brandy, Janet, Heather, Marshall, Dale, Mike, and Melissa), and Chris and Pete at Inman Perk Coffee Shop for creating such a friendly and hardworking environment.

My family back in Italy has been incredibly supportive and my daughter, Margot, has been the most graceful trooper. I am stunned and profoundly touched by her ability to take stakes in this project even though she is so young and so predictably conflicted about mom working all the time.

My deepest thanks to the series editors Mark J. Williams and Adrian W. B. Randolph at Dartmouth College Press for believing in this project, and to Richard Pult for his enthusiastic response and his utter cool. I finally would like to thank the artists who kindly granted permission to reproduce their work: Kara Walker, Hank Willis Thomas, Wangechi Mutu, Glenn Ligon, Nan Goldin, and J. S. G. Boggs.
