Acknowledgments

This book has been a long time in the making, and my obligations are numerous. My deepest debt is to the late Professor Philip E. Mosely, whose unfailing help and support enabled me to continue my work. His untimely death was a tremendous loss to American scholarship, but his achievements are of fundamental importance and they will loom still larger as time passes and their true dimensions become better known.

I am grateful to the following institutions which have provided research grants in support of my work: The Reim Foundation; the American Philosophical Society; the Humanities Fund, Inc.; and the Johns Hopkins University Faculty Research Grants. Some of the basic work was done under a year's appointment (1966–67) as a visiting scholar at the Russian Institute, Columbia University; I am indebted to the very capable staff of the Russian Institute, and especially to its then director, Professor Alexander Dallin, for this opportunity. I am grateful to Professor Alfred D. Chandler, Jr., former chairman of the Department of History, the Johns Hopkins University, for enabling me to take sabbatical leave at a critical time. My thanks go also to Professor Zbigniew K. Brzezinski, director of the Research Institute on Communist Affairs, for assistance while I was working at Columbia University.

In November 1968 the Research Seminar on Communist Affairs at Columbia provided an opportunity for me to present my analysis of the Twenty-second Congress of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union to what was, I fear, a fairly skeptical audience; I am grateful to Professor Marshall D. Shulman, director of the Russian Institute, for helping to arrange this presentation, to Mr. Paul Borsuk for his work as rapporteur, and to the participants in the seminar for their stimulating questions, comments, and objections.

Most of the research and writing was carried out at the Milton S. Eisenhower Library of the Johns Hopkins University. Mr. John Berthel, librarian, and his hard-working and devoted staff met every request for help promptly, sympathetically, and efficiently. At the Library of Congress, Dr. Paul L. Horecky, then associate director, now director of the Slavic and Central European Division, not only helped me locate obscure publications but also lent a sympathetic ear to my analysis of recent Soviet history. I have also used the Butler Library at Columbia University, the Lenin Library in Moscow, the New York Public Library, the University of Michigan Library, and the Michigan State University Library, and I am grateful to their staffs for help rendered.

Vital assistance was provided by the research department of Radio Liberty, Munich, in particular by its knowledgeable director, Dr. Albert Boiter; its assistant director, Mr. Peter Dornan, a valued friend and a fine scholar; and Mr. Christian Duevel, whose writings, were they better known, would ensure him recognition as one of the best informed and most penetrating analysts of Soviet affairs now at work.

Among the fellow-scholars who have contributed in one way or another to completion of the task, I express my gratitude to Professors Seweryn D. Bialer, Jerome D. Gilison, George Ginsburgs, Grey Hodnett, Michael Luther, and Jay Sorenson. Professor Stephen F. Cohen has been a constant source of information, insight, and challenge. An Americanist and a good friend, Professor Kenneth S. Lynn, volunteered to read the lengthy typescript and helped thereby to smooth the way for publication.

For encouragement to work in the challenging but difficult field of recent Soviet history I am grateful to Professors Peter H. Juviler and Henry W. Morton, who gallantly accepted an essay I wrote on recent Soviet foreign policy for a volume they were preparing on Soviet policy-formulation; this exploratory and in part speculative essay served as the pilot project for the longer, deeper, and larger work of which the present volume, in concept, forms a part. Professor Morton also kindly arranged a seminar of Manhattan-based scholars in the spring of 1967 at which I presented some of my conclusions and discussed briefly the procedures and principles on which the work is based.

I wish to thank Mr. Jack Goellner, editorial director of The Johns Hopkins University Press, for his encouragement, enthusiasm, and confidence. I am grateful also to Mr. Harold Ingle, director of the Press, for his steady support and interest, and to Mrs. Nancy Gallienne, who as my editor was a model of helpfulness and tact. The demanding task of typing the lengthy manuscript was admirably performed by Mrs. Catherine Grover. Several secretarial aides in the Department of History, the Johns Hopkins University, helped as needed; to all of them I am grateful.

Over the seemingly endless years during which the book was taking shape, my wife, Elizabeth, provided help and understanding for which I can never adequately thank her. So too, in their various ways, did our children, Ginny, Paul, and Jim. "Big Jim"—Dr. James Tape, our son-in-law—was one of the earliest members of my captive audience, and I am grateful for his patience, interest, and confidence in the ultimate outcome. I owe an enormous debt of gratitude to my uncle, Professor Jean Paul Slusser, for vital moral and material support and for an intelligent and critical evaluation of the book, much of which he read in manuscript. Another uncle, Professor Herbert R. Slusser, with his wife Lois, has been a numinous figure in my personal world as far back as I can remember; he, too, has served as a sounding-board for some of my fine-spun theories. And I cannot omit to mention with gratitude the late Mrs. Helen C. Wadsworth and her sister, Miss Alice E. Woodman, to both of whom I owe more than I can ever repay.
The usual disclaimer—that the final responsibility for the work in question rests with its author, and that the many people who have helped him are blameless for its faults or errors—is true in the most literal sense in the case of the present book. The help I have received in no way diminishes my responsibility for what I recognize to be, in part, highly unorthodox conclusions. The fact that some of those who helped me have tended to question my findings and look askance at my methods serves only to deepen my gratitude to them.
