I have incurred numerous debts in the course of developing, researching, and writing this book on the context of furnituremaking in preindustrial America. In honing the multidisciplinary nature of this study, I benefited greatly from the comments and suggestions of numerous colleagues, especially Abbott Lowell Cummings, John Demos, David Hall, Patricia Kane, John Kirk, Myron Stachiw, Robert Trent, and Electa Kane Tritsch. I am particularly pleased to recognize the contributions of two other individuals. James Henretta, who served as my advisor for the dissertation that forms the core of this book, was tireless in his close readings of the manuscript, provided extensive, insightful comments, and demanded that the study of material culture meet the highest standards of social history. Ann Smith, director of the Mattatuck Museum, hired me as a guest curator to research and mount an exhibition of Newtown and Woodbury furniture. Throughout planning the project, conducting research on local manuscripts and furniture, the exhibit’s installation, and preparation of the catalogue, Ann supported my endeavors with energy, enthusiasm, and commitment. Her insistence on the accessibility of public history kept my efforts grounded.

Most of my research involved months of extensive fieldwork in Connecticut. For help in locating examples of Newtown and Woodbury furniture and building an appropriate object pool, I would like to thank Harold Cole, Joel Finn, the late Ken Hammett, the late Frank Johnson, Dan Shied, Linda Stamm, William Warren, and many other private individuals whose homes I visited to examine furniture. One of the true joys of fieldwork is the opportunity to share information and to feel part of the process of maintaining historical memory. The staffs of many libraries, museums, historical societies, and town clerk’s offices also willingly provided assistance: Connecticut State Library, Yale University Library, Cyraneus Booth Library, Old Sturbridge Village, Yale University Art Gallery, Winterthur Museum, Colonial Williamsburg, Historic Deerfield, Mattatuck Historical Society, New Haven Colony Historical Society, Scott-Fanton House, Newtown Historical Society, Newtown Town Hall, Southbury Town Hall, and Woodbury Town Hall. During my time in Connecticut, many people offered hospitality and friendship: Woody and Beverly Mosch; Ken, Connie, and Matt Minor; Peter and Linda Nelson; David and Jacky Corrigan; Gene Leach; and Elizabeth Baker.

Several colleagues provided constant support, encouragement, and advice throughout the writing of this book and have read drafts of the manuscript. It is my hope that Bill Cotton, Adrienne Hood, Bill Hosley, and Barbara and Gerry Ward realize the important role they have played in shaping this publication.

In the course of research and writing, I have been very fortunate to receive several grants and fellowships. Costs of some of the early research were subsidized in part by the Mattatuck Museum during the planning stages for the 1982 exhibition “Fiddlebacks and Crooked-backs: Elijah Booth and Other Joiners in Newtown and Woodbury, Connecticut, 1750–1820.” That show and the accompanying catalogue attracted great interest in the area and brought many additional objects and account books to my attention. Through a Forman Fellowship at the Winterthur Museum, I was able to read the account books of many different New England joiners, draft the first two chapters of the book, and present my work to colleagues there. While working at the Museum of Fine Arts, Boston, I received a Lamb-Mellon Grant to undertake further documentation of the furniture of Newtown and Woodbury. I greatly appreciate the support and confidence of Alan Shestack and Jonathan Fairbanks in awarding me that grant. A senior faculty fellowship from Yale University made it possible to concentrate on preparation of the final manuscript.

Daniel Tenney and Celine Larkin willingly offered their considerable drafting skills, knowledge of graphics, and encouraging friendship. Luke Beckerdite, editor of American Furniture 1995, helped by commenting on part of the manuscript and procuring many of the photographs in this volume; an article condensed from chapters 1 and 2 appears in that journal. I would like to thank the Chipstone Foundation, publishers of American Furniture, for providing another forum in which to present my ideas. My editor at the Johns Hopkins University Press, Robert J. Brugger, and copyeditor Julie McCarthy provided excellent counsel and comments.

Personal thanks are owed to my parents, Ted and Barbara Cooke, and my sisters and their husbands, Allison and Blake Brown and Cate and Chip Lux, for their interest in my work. My greatest debt is to my wife, Carol, and our children, Ben and Rachel. Carol watched over this book for more than a decade and was indefatigable in her encouragement, support, and willingness to help see the publication to print. Ben and Rachel have provided important perspective and energy to the final product.
