Imperfect Solidarities

Lahiri, Madhumita

Published by Northwestern University Press

For additional information about this book
https://muse.jhu.edu/book/78588

For content related to this chapter
https://muse.jhu.edu/related_content?type=book&id=2735544

This work is licensed under a Creative Commons Attribution 4.0 International License.
Acknowledgments

This project has been with me for a very long time, and it is a pleasure to thank the many mentors, interlocutors, and friends who made this book possible.

This project originated in my graduate studies in the English Department at Duke University, with the support of the Program in Women’s Studies and the Franklin Humanities Institute. Jane Gaines insisted that I locate the central theoretical question; Maurice Wallace connected African Americanist queries to postcolonial ones; Ian Baucom knew the Gandhi chapter would be necessary; and Sean Metzger taught me how to spawn that most elusive of academic beasts: a strong argument. The late Srinivas Aravamudan encouraged my linguistic interests; Negar Mottahedeh demonstrated what postcolonial formalism could be. Ranjana Khanna transformed me into an academic, and her extraordinary intellectual perspicacity has shaped my knowledge of what postcolonial studies has been, should be, and might someday become. Ignacio Adriasola, Anne Gulick, Chase Foster, LaTarsha Pough, and Shilyh Warren are as smart as they are companionable: without our conversations, this book would not have been possible.

A summer at the School of Criticism and Theory significantly strengthened this book’s theoretical claims. Haun Saussy taught me about bilingualism, and I became friends with Katherine Baxter in the process. Her intellectual adventures continue to inform my own, whether in Ithaca, Hong Kong, or the Lake District. My Bengali skills were polished during a summer at the American Institute for Indian Studies’ program in Kolkata: I thank my instructors for their patience with my poor spelling, and Bridget Kustin for the kind of friendship that can traverse three continents.

Much of my work on Gandhi was undertaken during a postdoctoral fellowship at the Centre for Indian Studies in Africa at the University of the Witwatersrand, South Africa. I thank Dilip Menon for his leadership of that interdisciplinary conversation. Pamila Gupta, Megan Jones, Jedi Ramalapa, Kirk Sides, Micaela Smith, Jon Soske, and Tim Wright provided academic solidarity and good cheer, and they helped me consider what internationalist solidarity must become. Achille Mbembe encouraged me to move to South Africa; Sarah Nuttall made me understand the value of being there. To them, and to their lovely children, I am most grateful. Isabel Hofmeyr showed me how to make archivally grounded work theoretically compelling: her intellect, and her friendship, continue to inspire.

Part of this manuscript was undertaken at Brown University, where I benefited greatly from Timothy Bewes’s talent for theoretical accuracy. I thank Stuart Burrows, Michelle Clayton, Olakunle George, Sohini Kar, Tamar Katz, Aniruddha Maitra, Thangam Ravindranathan, and Zachary Sng for their friendship and their feedback, and Michael Steinberg for his leadership of our conversations at the Cogut Center for the Humanities. At the University of Warwick I delighted in an ongoing conversation around postcolonial theory and world literary studies, for which I thank Neil Lazarus, Gurinder Bhabha, Christina Britzolakis, Tina Lupton, and Rashmi Varma. Joe Jackson, Carina Hart, Mike Niblett, and Rochelle Sibley are the best pub companions one could imagine: I thank them for political rants, theoretical debates, and rambles in the Cotswolds.

I completed this manuscript at the University of Michigan, Ann Arbor, with the support of the Institute for Research on Women and Gender, the Center for South Asian Studies, and the Department of English Language and Literature. I thank Micah Auerback, Sara Blair, Julie Ellison, Farina Mir, Jonathan Freedman, Linda Gregerson, Danny Hack, Lucy Hartley, Matt Hull, Christi Merrill, Scotti Parrish, Derek Peterson, Adela Pinch, Aswin Punathambekar, Sid Smith, Xiaobing Tang, Tessa Tinkle, Valerie Traub, Gillian White, and Jonathan Zwicker for engaging with this manuscript in its formative stages. Michael Awkward has been a mentor, and occasionally a provocateur; David Porter has engaged my work at every stage, and with crucial queries that only he could devise. Gaurav Desai and Supriya Nair are astute guides to our shared and varied subfield: I thank both of them for their engagement with this work, their continued encouragement throughout the writing process, and (of course) their fabulous parties. I thank librarians Sigrid Cordell and Jeffrey Martin for their research guidance, and Matt Liberti and Alex Ramsey for their research assistance.

I went to graduate school at Vilashini Cooppan’s suggestion, and I revised this book with the benefit of her guidance. For both, I am most grateful. Mrinalini Sinha has read this manuscript in its entirety not once but twice: her generosity is both intellectual and personal. Manan Desai and Aliyah Khan have been solid comrades on the tenure track and enthusiastic coconspirators in postcolonial studies. I thank Amanda Armstrong-Price, Eliezer Ben Asher, Elizabeth Bruch, Miranda Brown, Deirdre de la Cruz, Clem Hawes, Tung-Hu Hui, Webb Keane, Aida and Ari Levy-Hussen, Victor Mendoza, Joshua Miller, Alana Price, Cathy Sanok, Meg Sweeney, Ruby Tapia, Kira Thurman, Melanie Yergeau, and Andrea Zemgulys for making Ann Arbor feel like home. Toy Basu, Varuni Bhatia, Erin Brightwell, and Jatin Dua deserve special commendation for their tailgating skills.

Working with the team at Flashpoints and at Northwestern University Press has been a pleasure: I thank Michelle Clayton, Susan Gillman, Trevor Perri, and Maia Rigas for their guidance, and two anonymous reviewers for their comments. The epigraph for this volume is from My Alexandria: Poems, copyright 1993 by Mark Doty, used by permission of the University of Illinois Press. I thank the Crisis Publishing Co., the publisher of the magazine of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, for the use of material first published in the July and October 1929 issues of The Crisis magazine.

Ashok and Rita Lahiri have built their lives in four countries and on three different continents: their fearlessness, their love, and their unending enthusiasm for, well, the entire world have shaped the argument on every page. I thank Arjun for Dr. Bakwaswala, and Amrita for Tungavidhya. Madhav, Kartik, and Shlok Kapoor have radiated their support in person and in video; Wren Fei-Ming Armstrong-Price, Mira Anahita, Nico Fox Elhanan Hu, and Sophia McDonald have brought joy on even the hardest days. AKPK’s love has been transcontinental, and unconditional; Rinu and Tanu have humored my attempts to understand the young. Mashi, Mesho, Vini, and Anuj have provided love and encouragement from fourteen hours in the future; Ishita, Dennis, and Meera have done the same from four hours’ drive south. Chinyere Ezie and Po-Ching Chen have been true friends, whether in laudable accomplishments or in unpublishable adventures.

S. E. Kile remains endlessly skeptical of the present: his linguistic enthusiasm, and his personal existence in deep time, means that our conversations regularly cross continents and span millennia. This book has benefited profoundly from our ongoing conversation; I continue to delight in his companionship and love.
Imperfect Solidarities