Acknowledgments

None of this would be possible without the love and support of my family—especially my mother’s unflagging faith in me. Thank you, Mom, for being the bedrock of my life. Jim, Heather, and Neil: you have been a tremendous inspiration—the many times you have made me laugh in the face of despair are too numerous to count.

This book began as my dissertation work at Rice University under the wise and wonderful direction of Steven Crowell, a man whose incisive critiques and disciplined writing will always serve as the philosophical model I strive to emulate. Steve’s extraordinary work on normativity and the space of meaning, on the relationship between Husserl and Heidegger, on the question of authenticity—among many other topics—is an exemplar of philosophical excellence. Thank you, Steve—it has been an honor and a privilege to work with you. The hours spent in your seminars will always number among my happiest.

I am grateful for the support provided by Rice University—including the Vaughn Dissertation Fellowship, the Mellon Foundation Fellowship, and the Dunlevie Teaching Fellowship. Rice was a marvelous place to attend graduate school, not only because of the exceptional faculty—especially George Sher, Rachel Zuckert, and Tristram Engelhardt—but also because of the wonderful graduate students with whom I shared many a beer and philosophical discussion at Valhalla. This book is about sharing the world with others, and what better people to teach me this than the following treasured souls: Will Smith, Matt Schunke, Philip Robinchau, Garret Merriam, Christine Ogilvie Hendren, Leslie McNolty, Dave Snyder, Michelle Calabretta, and Janet Malek. These pages are filled with your bright philosophical spirits.

In 2006 I received a research fellowship from the Deutscher Akademischer Austausch Dienst, for which I am extremely grateful. My year studying in Germany with the wonderful László Tengelyi at Bergische Universität played a tremendous role in developing my thinking on these issues. I am thankful to him and to the brilliant Inga Römer for their friendship.

Over the years I have had the privilege of working with several philosophers whose impact on my career cannot be overstated. Bill Blattner’s extraordinary work on Heidegger and temporality in many ways served as the spark that ignited the argument of this book. Though I adopt a critical stance toward his brilliant work, this should be taken as the highest compliment that one philosopher can pay another. Iain Thomson’s outstanding work and his support for my own philosophical pursuits are also deeply appreciated. I am grateful to Dermot Moran, whose visiting professorship at Rice came at the perfect time for helping me in the formative years of my dissertation writing. Dermot’s irrepressible spirit and unflagging enthusiasm for my work were a highlight of my time there.

Over the past six years I have been fortunate to work with marvelous colleagues in the philosophy department at the University of Arkansas. I am particularly grateful for the extraordinary support of Tom Senor—the world’s best department chair—and for the hours of philosophical debate with Jack Lyons. I will miss the friendly halls of Old Main.

Finally, I would like to thank Matthew Burch, my best friend, my wisest critic, and my most inspiring partner in all things. Nothing is more fun than discussing ideas with you. I am grateful beyond measure for the unbelievable support that you have always given me. I knew I liked you from the minute we met.
