Acknowledgments

Many people contributed to make this book a finished product and deserve recognition. To begin, I am deeply grateful to Brian Hosmer and Larry Nesper, the co-editors of SUNY’s Tribal Worlds series, for encouraging and full-heartedly supporting my efforts in putting this volume together. Since the inception of this project in the context of one Native American/Indigenous Studies Association (NAISA) meeting a few years ago, Brian and Larry have been instrumental in offering both invaluable suggestions on the broad intellectual architecture of the volume and careful advice all the way down to the small details of style. A labor of love, indeed.

I wish to extend my gratitude to NAISA for providing the intellectual and collegial context within which this project took shape and developed, as well as the many participants in its annual meetings since 2009 who have offered direct comments to early versions of some of the essays during panels or engaged me and the other authors in fruitful, multi-topic discussions that eventually found their way into this volume. I also acknowledge and thank indirectly the tribal nations that hosted each of those NAISA meetings.

I am grateful to the authors contributing to this volume for accepting this challenge with enthusiasm, producing outstanding essays, and displaying remarkable patience while waiting for this volume to take shape and proceed through the many editorial stages. I also thank them for the many intellectual exchanges we have had over the course of a few years while working on this volume. I have developed friendships that I cherish.

I extend my deepest gratitude to the anonymous reviewers, whose suggestions and critiques resulted in making this a stronger and better collection than what we started with, as well as the copyeditor and the indexer for their thorough work.

I extend my gratitude to Amanda Lanne-Camilli, acquisitions editor at SUNY Press, for her kind assistance. I commend Amanda, particularly, for addressing one potentially disrupting editorial “situation” with remark-able promptness, efficiency, and professionalism, reducing the issue to a mere bump in the road. I also wish to acknowledge the project editor, Jenn Bennett; the editorial assistant, Jessica Kirschner; the marketing director, Fran Keneston; and the production personnel for their dedication and outstanding work.

As far as my individual contribution to this volume goes, I wish to thank the many Mi’kmaw people who offered their help, ideas, support, and friendship since the onset of the research process that informs my essay. I cannot list you all for lack of sufficient space and confidentiality purposes, but you know who you are. Wela’lioq! (Thank you!)

I wish to thank Framingham State University for supporting my travelling to NAISA conferences between 2010 and 2014, and the Center for the Advancement of Research and Scholarship at Bridgewater State University, my current academic home, for a course release and a small grant that allowed me to finalize the manuscript.

Finally, I offer my gratitude and immense love to my wife Meredith and my wonderful daughter Olivia, who have offered unconditional support throughout the process. They have certainly built a sizable time credit that is overdue for settling.

Despite the help we have received, the authors and I are responsible for the content of this book. As the volume editor, responsibility falls ultimately on my shoulders, and I apologize for any inaccuracies this book may contain.
