Common Law Judging
Edlin, Douglas E.

Published by University of Michigan Press

Edlin, Douglas E.

For additional information about this book
https://muse.jhu.edu/book/47544
Acknowledgments

I am grateful to the readers of this book, in part or the whole, at various stages of its development. For their helpful suggestions and corrections, I am indebted to Tom Burke, Lisa Holmes, Helen Knowles, Kyle Kreider, Linda Meyer, Paul Nolette, Frederick Rauscher, and the readers for the University of Michigan Press. The comprehensive and thoughtful comments of the readers for the Press were enormously helpful to me, and along with my gratitude to them, I want to record my appreciation to Melody Herr, whose unflagging belief in this project, and gracious patience in awaiting its conclusion, have been so valuable to me. John Fullerton was there at the spiritual beginning of chapter 3. I am thankful for his ongoing willingness to read, and to read for the best possible reason.

I continue to benefit from the friendship, counsel, and exceptional senses of humor and judgment (in equal measure) of Beau Breslin and Mark Graber. I also continue to benefit, for all of their lives, from the presence of my nephews—Daniel, Gregory, and Benjamin—in my life. Along with their father and his father, they continually make me feel that I am on a winning team.

Chapter 3 was first published as “Kant and the Common Law: Intersubjectivity in Aesthetic and Legal Judgment,” in 23 Canadian Journal of Law & Jurisprudence 429 (2010). I appreciate the opportunity to have published my work there and the ability to develop that work here.

This book was completed with the support of a Neil MacCormick Fellowship at the University of Edinburgh Law School. The MacCormick Fellowship was an honor to receive and a pleasure to acknowledge. I also greatly appreciated the opportunity to present part of chapter 2 to the Centre for Law and Society, as well as the lively and engaging conversation that followed (in Old College and afterward). In particular, I thank Chris Himsworth for continuing that conversation with me.

Nancy and Matthew are the reason for everything, one way or another.
Common Law Judging