As I discovered anew over the years it took to complete this project, writing books, like acting, is a collaborative project that weaves together various spots in time. Many lives (and memories) are intertwined with the writing of this book, and I’m happy to be able to reflect on those relationships here.

First, I owe a great debt of thanks to my colleagues at the University of Southern California. Thank you to the office of the Dean of USC Dornsife for supporting my research through a generous publication subvention grant, and to the Early Modern Studies Institute at USC and its Director, Peter Mancall, for a summer fellowship in the early stages of this project and for later assistance with research funds, a portion of which enabled me to employ an absolutely stellar research assistant. Amanda Ruud, this assistant, deserves special commendation for her tireless and immaculate work on various stages of manuscript preparation. Numerous colleagues in my department read portions of this manuscript and provided feedback at talks: Paul Alkon, Joseph Boone, Devin Griffiths, Heather James, Rebecca Lemon, Margaret Russett, Hilary Schor, Bruce Smith. My chair, David St. John, provided various types of support at crucial stages during my research, and my USC students, graduate and undergraduate, stimulated my thinking along the way: thanks especially to Meli Farman for giving me the actor’s point of view. Thanks, too, to the USC Provost’s Office for supporting me at the very beginning of this process with an Advancing Scholarship in the Humanities and Social Sciences fellowship.
I’m fortunate to have the support of numerous colleagues at UCLA, including those in attendance at the Southern California eighteenth-century reading group and most particularly Helen Deutsch, Sarah Kareem, and Felicity Nussbaum, all of whom have been wonderful readers and amazing friends. I’ve also had the privilege of codirecting, with Felicity, an eighteenth-century seminar at the Huntington Library for the past ten years, and that seminar, with its many speakers and audience members—among them Lisa Freeman and Danny O’Quinn—influenced my argument as it developed. Thank you to Steve Hindle, Director of the Huntington, for hosting our colloquium, and to Peter Mancall and the Early Modern Studies Institute at USC, for funding it. Thanks to my American Society for Eighteenth-Century Studies colleagues, near and far, for their comments over the years: Brad Pasanek, Sean Silver, Susan Carlile, Nush Powell, Jayne Lewis, Bob Folkenflik, Danny O’Quinn, Susan Lanser, Lisa Freeman, Julia Fawcett, Stuart Sherman, Jon Mee, Bill Warner, Katie Charles, and Taylor Walle. Thanks to Lisa, Helen, Jayne, Felicity, and Stuart, for writing me many letters over the years, sometimes at the eleventh hour.

My Yale classmates, colleagues, and friends still provide my intellectual foundation: Joseph Roach, who read in its entirety an early draft of this manuscript and whose influence is everywhere apparent; and Jill Campbell, who with Joe helped shape me as a young scholar. I number Jessica Leiman, Emily Setina, and Ayesha Ramachandran among my most important readers and friends. Deborah Friedell remains the undergraduate student I’m most happy to have met.

I’m grateful to my editor at the University of Michigan Press, LeAnn Fields, for her interest in this project and to Jenny Geyer and the entire staff at Michigan for their prompt and professional handling of the manuscript. My two anonymous readers for the press gave me the most helpful, generous, and engaged reports I’ve ever received, and the book is far better for their input. Portions of chapter 3 previously appeared in Eighteenth-Century Fiction; portions of chapter 5 previously appeared in PMLA. I thank both journals for the permission to republish that material here.

Finally, my family remains the glue that holds the rest of my life together. I thank my parents, John and Susan Hodgson, for their unflagging support, Tater for her love and snuggles, and Owen and Dylan for making me a mother and showing me every day how to live in the present. I love you boys so much, and I dedicate this book—albeit one without pictures of fire trucks—to you.
