I COULDN’T POSSIBLY have completed this book without the help of my supportive community at the University of Michigan Law School, to whom I will be forever grateful. I am also tremendously thankful to many around the country who gave me tours through William Cook’s former stomping grounds, clued me in to family histories, and guided me through archives, court records, genealogies, and American legal history.

My colleagues, Fran Blouin, director of the University of Michigan Bentley Historical Library, and Jerry Dupont, now of LLMC Digital in Hawaii, and formerly student and librarian at Michigan Law, each carefully read a version of the book and made frank suggestions that helped me see that it needed additional spices and stirring, some leavening and reshaping, and, finally, a bit more “cooking.” I am humbly grateful for their help.

At Michigan Law I am deeply grateful to Dean Evan Caminker and his predecessor, Dean Jeffrey Lehman, for their belief in Cook’s importance. Without my colleagues in the Law Library, the book would not have happened, and they helped in more ways than I can list (librarian-like, this list is alphabetical): Mary Clemence, Barbara Garavaglia, Kathy Nilsen, Veronica Richard, Barbara Snow, Deborah Tennant, and Sandy Zeff. Other members of the Law School community to whom I am obliged are former assistant to the dean, Brent Dickman (now at Yale Law School); assistant dean Todd Baily; law professors A. W. Brian Simpson, William J. Novak, and Sallyanne Payton; and my former colleagues Grace Tonner (now professor at University of California, Irvine School of Law) and Andrea Lyon (now professor at DePaul University College of Law). I am also indebted to these two inspirational mentors: law professor emeritus Alfred Conard, who died in fall 2009 and remained interested in Cook to the end, and University of Michigan history of art professor emerita Ilene Forsyth.

I am profoundly appreciative of those who generously educated me, in person and through their writing. These include Columbia University Journalism School professor Richard John; Hillsdale College professor emeritus Arlen Gilbert; University of Michigan music professor Robert Grijalva; Martha Cook Building director Marion Scher; and Lawyers Club director Diane Nafranowicz.

I cannot thank enough William Cook’s relatives, who provided me with essential information. Most significant of all was Ann Bradford Cook, who is the granddaughter of Chauncey Cook, William Cook’s favorite brother. Ann carries on the spirit of sharp intelligence and generosity that runs in the family. She shared her hospitality and her family treasures as we spent happy hours together. Ann’s niece, Martha Cook Nash Campos, a former student of mine, cheered me on, and Florentine Cook Heath’s son, William Heath, shared documents with me.

Ida Olmstead’s relatives, Larry McGill and his sister, Julia McGill, provided much invaluable detail when we spoke and e-mailed and gave me key photos and letters. Larry was kind and generous, but, thankfully, he questioned me when I made unsupported assumptions.

I could never have completed this book without the help of the librarians and archivists who guided me through so many mazes: director Fran Blouin, archivists Karen Jania and Malgosia Myc, and the entire staff at the University of Michigan Bentley Historical Library; Paul McCutcheon at the National Postal Museum Library; the staff at Columbia University’s Avery Architectural and Fine Arts Library; Hillsdale College librarian Linda Moore; Thomas N. Savini, director of the Livingston Masonic Library in Manhattan; Paul D. Reitz, who in his capacity as the current secretary of Kane Lodge provided me with invaluable records; adjunct reference librarian Tania Colmant-Donabedian of the Port Chester Public Library; Myrna Sloan of the Bryant Local History Room at the Roslyn (New York) Public Library; and office assistants Rose D’Ascoli and Jennifer M. Leichter in the Village of Rye Brook offices.

I could not have done without University of Michigan School of Information research assistants Ted Lawless, Saradina Doan, Kasia Solon, and Beth Williams.

The Kenyon Writers Workshop in 2008 and 2009 helped me become a better writer—mirabile dictu. I am especially grateful to have fallen under the guidance of nonfiction writer and poet Rebecca McClanahan.

I send special thanks to Charles G. Wallace of the Harrison County Historical Society in Cadiz, Ohio. Without his help, I would have found out very little about concert pianist Isabel Hauser’s will or about her life in Cadiz.

I thank Scott Savini and Ted Cart for their personal tours and access to records at the Blooming Grove Hunting and Fishing Club in Pike County, Pennsylvania.

I thank Michael Mohr, David Kirkland, and Kent E. Webb at Steinway and Sons in Long Island, New York, who opened company records to me.
I thank Mike Savitski and Amanda Jones, my superb book designers.

I thank my editor, Penny Schreiber, who worked miracles on the text, clarified what I had complicated, and suggested uncountable improvements. I am also delighted that she shares my desire to have known Jim Murfin.

And, finally, I could not have written this book if it were not for my husband, Russ Serbay, who endured years of what he referred to as my “Cooking,” even though it resulted in not a bite of food. He traveled with me, listened to me read text out loud for hours, suggested improvements, and never lost faith in me and my “Cook” book.
