Writing this book has been a long process and, like most acts of love, both pleasurable and painful. My first lengthy research trip to Agua Blanca in 2001 was funded through Fulbright CIES. Research in 2003 was supported through a University of Notre Dame intramural grant, and in 2009 through a University of Colorado Committee on Research and Creative Works grant. I would like to thank Chad Chisholm, Pedro Douglas Ventura Asunción, and Emily Hecker for permission to use their photos in the manuscript; my stepfather Mike Harvey for restoring archival photos and reformatting others; and two anonymous reviewers for their helpful comments.

Alan Klima deserves accolades for setting up a very supportive online academic writing community. Thanks to all my chatroom companions for helping provide momentum throughout the writing process, particularly to Kate Martineau, Meg Stalcup, Michelle Stewart, Suraiya Jetha, Whitney Kazemipour, Chelsea Blackmore, Nicholas D’Avella, Jake Culbertson, and Ann Lucado for weeks of online work sessions, feedback, and general camaraderie.

Very special thanks go to Angela Knipe, my mother Jackie Harvey (who has read and commented insightfully on nearly everything I’ve ever written), and my husband Alfredo Ventura. Each of them read the full manuscript and provided extensive commentary that I hope has helped me describe complicated processes in a broadly accessible way.

Without Alfredo’s support more generally, this would have been a very different book. He helped organize field schools in Agua Blanca, coordinated meetings with the community to get broad feedback on the ideas put forth within the book, and listened to all my ideas, even the ones that woke me up at two in the morning.

Y finalmente, quiero agradecer a los aguablanquenses por su apoyo y cariño durante los últimos catorce años. Espero que este libro les sea útil y que sigan siempre en sus tierras, las cuales también he llegado a querer.
