This ethnography would not be possible without the City Church of Christ (City COC) church members who welcomed me into their homes and lives. I am especially thankful to the major research participants who read this manuscript and commented with respect toward my commitment to a sociological perspective. My hope is that they and their church brothers and sisters are able to continue to foster a meaningful religious community through challenging times.

I am forever thankful for my training as an ethnographer in the Department of Sociology at Brandeis University. Karen V. Hansen provided constant inspiration, support, and critical feedback, as well as invaluable advice on balancing work and family. Stefan Timmermans helped shape this ethnography and offered wise direction through field dilemmas and the emotional tasks of doing fieldwork in challenging settings. Peter Conrad was a constant source of encouragement and critical reflection. Thanks to Debra Osnowitz who read multiple drafts of this book and whose sociological imagination, analytical insight, and friendship keep my spirit high. Thanks also to Claude for his therapeutic correspondence.

I am forever indebted to Lynn Davidman for her purple pen, encouragement of my work, friendship, and for awakening the sociologist in me. John Bartkowski’s scholarship motivated me early in my career to pursue the dynamism of gender in the U.S. evangelical subculture. His advice and criticism helped shape Awesome Families. Michael Emerson has read my work on the ICOC over the years and helped shape, in particular, my analysis of multiculturalism and multiracialism in the movement. Thank you to the anonymous reviewers for their helpful comments and guidance. Thanks also to the sociology faculty and Diane at Clark University for providing a nurturing and supportive work environment as I wrote the book. Thanks to my dear friend and anthropologist, Christa Little-Siebold, for reminding me of my voice and motivation early in the writing process.

Several friends and family members made this work possible. My stepbrother and his wife encouraged me to explore community in the ICOC and were willing, over the years, to talk with me about their experience in the church. My mother and stepfather maintained open minds and supported my efforts to understand the complex culture of the ICOC movement. My husband, Mark, offered constant understanding of the time and commitment it takes to conduct fieldwork and to write a dissertation and book. My young daughters, Kathryn Rae and Jackie Boyd, spent time with me in the field—in utero and out; their unconditional love and brightness of spirit feed my spirit. My long-term separation from my son was a constant reminder of the frustration and love that can lead parents to search for hope and peace in religious community. Judith O’Donnell and Tim Corkery convinced me long ago that what I thought were impossible goals, were well within my reach. Thanks to my mother-in-law, Lynn Lerman, for her constant support and reading and commenting on the introduction. Thank you to Julie VanNoppen for twelve years of loving friendship and our morning Dexter Park walk that has motivated me through the most difficult of times. Dawn Kerr offered much support, theological discussion, and coffee cake. A special thank-you to David Eliet for instilling a confidence and trust in my voice so many years ago.
