In many ways this book began long before my formal training as an ethnographer. Growing up in East Oakland, I spent years walking the streets of the community as I traveled to and from school, work, the grocery store, and so on. It was then that I first became troubled by the routine public interactions and encounters black women and girls faced, with violence, hostility, harassment, and humiliation being a part of each day. Returning as a graduate student I employed my ethnographic training in a quest to uncover what exactly women here were encountering, what their interactions mean, and how they make sense of these daily lived experiences. I was disturbed by the trauma that resulted from such encounters and equally intrigued by the conditions under which these realities were unfolding. The Grind is an ethnographic account of how black women and girls work tirelessly to navigate poor inner-city life and the myriad ways in which it is complicated by their race and gender. To the women who allowed me into their community and their lives, thank you for sharing your important stories.

Over the last several years, many people have graciously offered their insight, encouragement, wisdom, and support to help bring this book to fruition. I am so very grateful and would like to acknowledge them here; please forgive any inadvertent omissions.

As a graduate student in the Department of Sociology at the University of California–Santa Barbara (UCSB) I received tremendous support, mentoring, and a deep commitment to this project from Nikki Jones, Sarah Fenstermaker, and George Lipsitz. Their encouragement, criticism, and counsel have helped me stretch and grow as both a scholar and a human being. I am forever thankful to Nikki Jones for her consistent and careful reading, thoughtful recommendations, and ongoing mentorship; her dedication to improving the lives of black women and girls has been a critical force throughout this project, and I hope her influence and guidance is clear in this book. Sarah Fenstermaker challenged me to be sharper and more critical in my assertions and gave me the confidence to wrestle with my arguments to push them further; I thank her for her ongoing inspiration, mentorship, and generosity. George Lipsitz has influenced me beyond words; his unflinching support throughout my journey has seen me through some of my toughest days and greatest victories as a scholar. His dedication to scholarship, activism, and to human kind is exemplary, and his work and wisdom continue to shape my scholarship and teaching. I am grateful to G. Reginald Daniel, who has provided guidance, inspiration, and friendship during my time at UCSB and beyond.

This research also benefited from the financial support of several fellowships at various stages of my career, including the National Science Foundation–University of California Diversity Initiative for Graduate Study in the Social Sciences Summer Research Fellowship; the William T. Grant Foundation Mentor Supplement Award (with Nikki Jones); the UCSB Disabled Students Program; Ridley-Tree Scholarship; the UCSB Graduate Division Dissertation Fellowship; and the Research, Scholarly, and Creative Activity Award from California State University, Dominguez Hills (CSUDH).

I am deeply grateful to my colleagues and students at CSUDH for all that they continue to teach me; It is a privilege and a joy to work and learn with you. I am thankful to the Dean’s Office in the College of Natural and Behavioral Sciences at CSUDH and to Kara Dellacioppa, chair of the Department of Sociology, for providing the resources necessary for completing this manuscript. I am especially grateful to the Department of Sociology for providing an enthusiastic and encouraging space in which to complete this book. Thank you to my colleagues Katy M. Pinto, La Tanya Skiffer, José Prado, Joanna Perez, Kelyn Li, Matthew Mutchler, Gretel Vera-Rosas, Jeb Middlebrook, Sohaila Shakib, and Raman Brar. I am forever grateful to the members of the Warriors’ Writing Group for their ongoing support, wisdom, encouragement, and optimism; the shared commitment to the fight for justice and equality is exceptional, and their intellectual stimulation and friendship is a reminder of the joy that can come within the struggle for justice. I also extend my appreciation and thanks to Keisha Paxton and the CSUDH Faculty Development Center for resources that helped support my work on this project.

I am grateful to the many colleagues and friends (some of whom are already mentioned above) who have supported me and this work in a variety of forms, including reading this work in varying stages and offering immeasurable feedback, thoughtful insight, enthusiasm, and encouragement. Thank you also to Christopher Bickel, Kenly Brown, Joan Budesa, Jordan T. Camp, James Cantres, Tomás Carrasco, Carla Coco-Boutté, Alison Dahl Crossley, Janette Diaz, FC, Kelly Foster, Jerry Flores, Bridget Harr, Christina Jackson, Tonya Lindsey, Monica Lomeli, Patrick Lopez-Aguado, Veronica Montes, Daniel Olmos, Steven Osuna, Nathalie Pierre, Carolyn Pinedo-Turnoďsky, Jennifer Rogers-Brown, Rebecca Romo, Xuan Santos, Denise Segura, Barbara Tomlinson, Angel Valdivia, and the late Clyde Woods.

I thank Debra Guckenheimer, Hillary Potter, and the anonymous reviewers of the manuscript for their critical suggestions and support of this project. I am grateful to my editor, Peter Mickulas, for his enthusiasm and commitment to this project. The outstanding editorial work of Sean Mannion improved this manuscript enormously.

Finally, I am very fortunate to be surrounded by an amazing group of family and friends. To my grandparents, aunts, uncles, cousins, siblings, and friends outside of academia, thank you for your love and for being by my side every step of the way. I owe tremendous gratitude to my father, Robert L. McCurn, for always pushing me to be my best; his wisdom, work ethic, and love continue to have an impact on me, more than he’ll ever know. To my mother, Sharon C. McCurn, who was my very first teacher and has always been my greatest supporter, words cannot adequately describe your contribution to this book; you have shared my joys and struggles, offered compassion and critique, and never once wavered in your commitment and faith in me and this work. To you I dedicate this book.
