Suffering For Science
Rebecca Herzig

Published by Rutgers University Press

Herzig, Rebecca.
Suffering For Science: Reason and Sacrifice in Modern America.
Project MUSE. muse.jhu.edu/book/17241.

For additional information about this book
https://muse.jhu.edu/book/17241

For content related to this chapter https://muse.jhu.edu/related_content?type=book&id=574391
ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

The congruities of researching and writing about people who suffer for knowledge did not escape my attention. Many people helped me through the long and sometimes painful process of completing this book. My debts to them are innumerable.

I am grateful to the five different academic communities that wagered financial resources on this project: the Program in Science, Technology, and Society at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology (MIT); the Department of History of Science and Technology at Kungl Tekniska Högskolan (KTH) in Stockholm; the Dibner Institute for the History of Science and Technology in Cambridge, Massachusetts; the Centre for the History of Science, Technology, and Medicine at the University of Manchester; and the Program in Women and Gender Studies at Bates College. I also thank colleagues at Colby College, KTH, Leeds University, Manchester University, MIT, Rensselaer Polytechnic Institute, the University of California at San Diego, and the University of New Hampshire for opportunities to present previous versions of this material. Had I the capacity to incorporate more fully those audiences’ many thoughtful comments, this surely would be a better book. My gratitude goes as well to the many librarians and archivists who aided this project over the years, particularly Heidi Herr at Johns Hopkins University; Helen Samuels at MIT; John Waggener at the University of Wyoming; and Tom Hayward, Perrin Lumbert, and Chris Schiff at Bates. For permission to reproduce unpublished or previously published material, I thank the American Heritage Center at the University of Wyoming, the Archives and Special Collections Department of Clark University, the Boston Medical Library in the Francis A. Countway Library of Medicine, the George J. Mitchell Department of Special Collections and Archives at Bowdoin College, the Johns Hopkins University Press, and the Ferdinand Hamburger Archives at Johns Hopkins University.

My thinking about science, American history, and words and the worlds to which they refer owes more to Leo Marx than to anyone else. Among the countless ways in which Leo contributed to the making of this book, perhaps most crucial was his insistence that I write, as he put it, from my “own deepest convictions.” Leo’s serious, patient commitment to bringing those convictions to light not only sustained my completion of this study but also emboldened the rest of my endeavors. I extend to him my most heartfelt appreciation. Deborah Fitzgerald and Evelynn Hammonds joined Leo in supervising the 1998 dissertation that grew into this book; I thank them for their incisive suggestions on that version of the project and for their continued guidance.

Other teachers also inspired this effort. I am especially indebted to those responsible for the remarkable education I received in the California public school system. In Lakeside, those people include Maureen Begley, Greg Carlson, Jan Coulsby, and Jerome Lipetzk; and in Santa Cruz, they include Jennifer Anderson, Chris Connery, Donna Haraway, Paul Niebanck, and Dan Scripture. I am daily grateful for all they have made possible for me.

At the other end of the country, members of two different writing groups helped me to gestate this book over the years: in Massachusetts, Vitka Eisen, Paula Hooper, Angela Radan, and Barbara Schulman; and in Maine, Lisa Botshon, Monica Chiu, Robin Hackett, Melinda Plastas, Eve Raimon, and Siobhan Senier. Audra Wolfe, my editor at Rutgers, helped move the manuscript from its pupal form with her enthusiastic response to an early essay in American Quarterly; Dawn Potter’s superb copyediting rescued the book from more numerous infelicities. I owe a great deal as well to two anonymous reviewers for their astute critiques of early material submitted to the Press. Laura Briggs reviewed the completed manuscript, and her perceptive and heartening comments greatly assisted my final revisions. I also thank the many colleagues and students at Bates whose kind inquiries helped nudge this book out the door. I am especially grateful to Rachel Austin and Erica Rand, whose attentive readings of the entire manuscript improved it immeasurably, and to Lorelei Purrington and Regan Richards, whose expert assistance and good cheer were vital as deadlines approached.

The influence of Jill Hopkins Herzig, my mother, hiking partner, and lifelong intellectual companion, appears everywhere in these pages. Her way of being in the world continues to establish for me the standard by which to gauge “how one should live.” Joel, Micah, and Rachel Herzig brought mirth and camaraderie to this effort as to all others. Jenny Reardon, my interlocutor on all subjects, has consistently sought to understand the connections between this study and the rest of my life, and for that loving effort in particular I am thankful.

For generative conversations, careful readings, and general encouragement, I also thank Jon Adler, Jon Agar, Kiran Asher, Jim Austin, Christine Baldwin, Bennett Battaille, Connie Battaille, Gordon Battaille, Jenny Beckman, Danielle Benedict, Roberta Bivins, Curtis Bohlen, Geoffrey Cantor, Heidi Chirayath, Greg Clancey, Stephen Collier, Bill Corlett, Jim Daly, Lorraine Daston, Elizabeth Eames, Michael Fischer, Dan Freeman, Mats Fridlund, Jan Golinski, Penelope Gouk, Leslie Hill, Jeff Hughes, Margaret Imber, Arne Kaijser, Thomas Kaiserd, Evelyn Fox Keller, Sasha Keller, Chris Kelty, Sharon Kinsman, Andy Lakoff, Hannah Landecker, Svante Lindqvist, Tina Malcolmson, Lisa Maurizio, Andy Martin,

Since this book is, in many ways, a meditation on loss, it is fitting to dedicate it to Sidney J. Herzig and Norman O. Brown, whose deaths (one sudden and shocking, one long anticipated and discussed) merely served to accentuate their pervasive, abiding influence on my life and thought. To the extent that it is mine to offer, this book is for them.