Faithful Transgressions In The American West

Bush, Laura

Published by Utah State University Press

For additional information about this book
https://muse.jhu.edu/book/9304

For content related to this chapter
https://muse.jhu.edu/related_content?type=book&id=201846
Acknowledgments

To begin, I would like to acknowledge Robert Stepto, Professor of African American Studies, American Studies, and English at Yale University, who first introduced me in 1992 to the notion of studying autobiographical narratives as literary acts. During a summer class he taught on American autobiography at Bread Loaf School of English, his intelligence, humor, and enthusiastic support of my own life writing inspired me to begin serious study of Mormons’ prolific autobiographical writing tradition.

I am indebted to Melody Graulich and Julia Watson for their careful reading of an earlier draft of this book. Their extensive recommendations for improving it have been invaluable. As editors, John Alley and Rebecca Marsh have been wonderfully accommodating and professional throughout the process. Any weaknesses remaining in this final draft are mine.

I would also like to thank the following people for their continuing support of my work:

Kathleen Sands, Professor of English at Arizona State University, has been the guiding force behind the dissertation that led to this book. She always showed unwavering commitment to the project’s success and spent many hours untangling sentences and ideas that I needed to struggle through to develop my arguments. I owe her much.

Eugenia DeLamotte, Associate Professor of English at ASU, and Katherine Kent, Assistant Professor of English at Williams College, offered insightful feedback and caring support as committee members who influenced my thinking at many stages of this project.

Duane Roen, Professor of English and Director of ASU’s Center for Learning and Teaching Excellence, afforded me the professional time and backing that enabled me to finish this manuscript while also working at the Center.

Eric Bateman, a colleague from our former days teaching together in the English department at Ricks College, sent witty e-mail messages from his office in Nevada, offering “nitpicky” but invaluable and supportive feedback. He is one among several Mormon intellectual friends of mine who understand the conflicts and paradoxes that result from our common religious heritage.
Eugene England, Professor of English, Mormon scholar, and author, read an early version of the introduction to this book. I regret that he did not live to see it reach publication, but he deserves my thanks for initiating an important and ongoing conversation about Mormon literature that I hope my work contributes to and carries forward in his honor.

Kenneth Morrison, Professor of Religious Studies at ASU, has been the exceptional colleague, mentor, and friend I needed to help me continue sorting through personal and professional issues regarding Mormonism and religion in general. I am indebted to him for introducing me to Martin Buber, for reading and commenting on many chapters of this book, and for helping me to refine my ideas. I am especially grateful for our long conversations over his fine cooking, just when I needed both food and perceptive insight to sustain me. He knows and practices what authentic community means.

Friends I would like to thank for our past and present conversations about Mormonism include Karen Anderson, Cynthia Ashworth, Mary Bradford, Bob Bringhurst, Jeanne Clark, Kip Clark, Ted DiPadova, Laurie DiPadova-Stocks, Mark England, Cory Fehlberg, Kathee Godfrey, Mary Johnston, Angela Livesey, Elizabeth McNeil, Carol Pierce, Cyndi Pearson, Bill Silcock, Deb Thornton, Jolene Wolfley, and John Zardus. Thanks to many other friends, extended family, and neighbors, who patiently listened and cared about me, even as I complained about the struggle to find time to work on “my book.”

Most of all, I would like to thank my immediate family, especially my identical twin sister, Sarah, and my dear mother, Clara. They have supported me throughout a writing journey that has lasted many years. Without their love, this book would not be.