Acknowledgments

Without the help of a great many friends, we three authors would never have been able to manage the logistics and complexities of putting this book together. Spread across the continent from Newfoundland to Utah to Texas, e-mail served us well, but our friends made the book happen. We would like to thank the following people: Joan Alessi for her haunted house photograph; John Alley and Utah State University Press for their preternatural patience; John Ashton for the book title; the nameless bar in Edinburgh where we conjured up the topic; Nancy Banks for accompanying Jeannie on ghost tours and through the infamous Winchester Mystery House; Ian Brodie for technical assistance with the electronic versions of the photographs; Bill Ellis for his prescient reading of an earlier version of the manuscript; Burt Feintuch for technical assistance with PhotoShopping; Janet Langlois for serving as discussant on our AFS panel at which we introduced some of this material; Carl Lindahl for his photographs at the San Antonio railroad tracks; Lynne McNeill for photographs, bibliographical assistance, and for participating in our AFS panel on this topic in 2003; Wayne Smith for photography and technical assistance; Madison and Rio Thomas for their artwork; and the International Society for Contemporary Legend Scholarship for bringing the three of us together.
