I’ll take you apart and assemble a new one out of you, someone sweeter and with smaller hands and more to say. Miniature, almost, almost fit for a helium balloon to lift and send off. The parts left over can be another you, the you with the blank eyes and the bitter taste in the mouth. And this one I’ll take up and this one I’ll take down.