We the apple refuse the night,
its muddied trucks,
the world outside the orchard.
We’re done with hands,
their shadows heavy across us. The rain is what summons. Bullets drill coves into the air, their creativity missing us completely.
Somewhere, you are through with us as well, through with knives drifting our oceanous bodies and our hard children scuttling like beetles down the drain.
The rain. A posture among us: two flags droop as the soil below gapes, the midnight crew burying horses again.
Had we but skeletons for what once were our wings before they curled tight to the stem, we could levitate until sunrise.
Look at us.
When we fall it is straight and down, the earth swelling a little to reap our gravity.
