She limps down the mountain:
pair of hole-ridden feet clapping leathered mouths on rock.
A button of green wrestles among exploding coal mounds and shrivels. She stares at stones as they flock into liquid, surveys her isle of blisters and congregating gas clouds.
The last bird she saw (a blue jay,
a blue jay!) attacked her.
Four thousand years south where the mudslides of Peru once hardened over jungle expanse, the green sleeve, the green ladle, the green wound, the green teeth are dusting in the metal dirt while her lungs like pears rot inward.
Some light lies deviled beneath.
Some worlds won’t arc again.
