IT IS A distinct pleasure to finally be able to acknowledge the many people who have shared with me their time and learning during the long years of study that culminate with this book.

Columbia University has been home to many scholars of Judaica, several of whom have played an important role in ushering me into their ranks. Professors Isaac Barzilay, Arnold Eisen, Arthur Hertzberg, Paula Hyman, Michael Stanislawski and Yosef Hayim Yerushalmi have, each in his or her own way, shown me new approaches to important texts and historical issues. I am grateful to them all.

Professor Ismar Schorsch, now chancellor of the Jewish Theological Seminary, was always willing to take time from a busy schedule to share his learned and eloquently formulated views on all aspects of modern jüdische Wissenschaft.

Professor David Halivni, erstwhile colleague and ever teacher and friend, has, over the years, been far more generous in sharing his time and impressive learning than I had any right to expect. I can never repay his kindness; I can merely acknowledge it with profound gratitude. I can only hope that when my time comes to welcome and nurture a younger colleague I can do so with the grace and warmth he has shown me. I miss our almost daily discussions and friendly arguments.

Since coming to Cambridge, I have benefitted from the many helpful comments of Professors James Kugel, Bernard Septimus and Isadore Twersky. I am grateful for the interest they have shown in me and my work. They, too, have each demonstrated the art of welcoming a new colleague with open arms. For that, as well, I am grateful.

Over the last ten years I have enjoyed the close friendship of Benjamin R. Gampel and Jeffrey S. Gurock. Each has read portions of this work and commented without restraint, as only good friends can. They have both been sources of encouragement and, perhaps more important, comic relief. Dr. Celia Deutsch read an earlier version of chapter 4. I am grateful for her help. I have also enjoyed the intellectual companionship of Rabbi Doug Lerea.

This book grew out of a Columbia University dissertation. I have learned a great deal from the comments of the committee before whom I defended it. I extend many thanks to Professors Isaac Barzilay, G. Scott Davis, Arnold Eisen, Wayne Proudfoot, Ismar Schorsch, and Yosef Hayim Yerushalmi.

In turning that dissertation into a book, I have benefited from the insight and wisdom of Professor Steven T. Katz, the editor of this series.

Moving on to the financial side, I wish to record with gratitude the aid of the Memorial Foundation for Jewish Culture, and the Columbia University Council for the Humanities.

More than colleagues, teachers, friends, advisers, editors and financial institutions, the pursuit of learning depends on the hospitable environment created by a supportive family. I have been blessed with such a family. My parents, Stella and Herbert Harris, have always enthusiastically shown their commitment to my intellectual development and to Jewish learning and causes generally. From the many rewritten grade school compositions to my most recent scholarly endeavor, from their attendance at my public lectures to their considerable financial investment in my education, they have always been unswerving in their love and support.

My in-laws, Jack and Fanny Lust, have always shown respect and appreciation for the world of Jewish learning. They have made me feel very much at home.

My brother, Marc, read and copyedited an earlier version of this book. With an MBA's concern for economy, he managed to turn many of my more Germanic sentences into digestible English. That, despite his best efforts, so many remain, is testimony only to my own incorrigibility.

I have been blessed with wonderful children. Elana lived through all the years in which dissertation became book. Her insistence in recent years that she be given equal time at the computer may have slowed things a bit, but the chance to "work" and share her company simultaneously has been more than worth it. Rebecca came along midway through the process; like her sister, she too wanted computer time, and she too has been a delight. Finally, there is David, who came along as I was finishing this book. Unlike his sisters, he has not helped with the typing; he has, in his four months, slept enough to allow me to finish, and been awake enough to bring joy to our home.

Rebecca and David were named for the only grandparents I really knew, Regina Greenstein and David Harris. I deeply regret that they are not able to enjoy holding this book in their hands. They would have been proud.

I cannot begin to express my appreciation to my wife, Cheryl, for all that she has done to make our home a place I love to be. She has supported my work while pursuing her own with an energy that is remarkable. The dedication of this book to her is but a mere token of the deep respect and affection I feel.
