Over the years, many people have assisted in the thinking, writing, and making of this book. It is a sincere pleasure to finally thank them in these pages. For helping me to conceive and reconceive the dissertation project that evolved into this book I would like to thank Jonathan Elmer and Deidre Lynch as well as committee members Mary Favret and Kirsten Sword. Your thoughtful feedback and continual mentoring have made all the difference in my success. Many others at Indiana University (IU) provided guidance and support for this project, including the faculty in the English and gender studies programs, members of the Center for Eighteenth-Century Studies, English graduate secretary Beverly Hankins, and IU’s ever-helpful librarians. I am so fortunate to have made lasting friendships with IU friends Jim Berkey, Jon Blandford, and Ana Owusu-Tyo who helped me to think, write, and laugh more than they will ever know. A special shout-out here as well to Celia Barnes, Michael Brown, JoEllen Delucia, Melissa Jones, Chad Luck, Jessica Lewis Luck, Tobias Menely, Sarah Murphy, Kristen Renzi, Brandi Stanton, Roger Stanton, Courtney Wennerstrom, and Paul Westover.

At Knox College, I would like to thank current and former members of the English department, especially Monica Berlin, Robert Hellenga, Ed Niehus, Audrey Petty, Natania Rosenfeld, Lori Schroeder, Rob Smith, and Barbara Tannert-Smith, as well as the McNair program staff and the incredible Knox librarians for rigorous intellectual discussion, excellent opportunities for research and teaching, and constant kindness and support during my undergraduate education and beyond. Carley Robison deserves special mention for nurturing my love of old books. Thanks for setting me on the path, friends.

I am fortunate to have many generous colleagues who have offered welcome assistance in reading chapter drafts, relaying professional advice, and proffering much-needed friendship. At Ball State University, I thank current and former faculty members Amit Rahul Baiysha, Adam

At my current institution, Northern Illinois University (NIU), thanks especially to Phil Eubanks and Amy Levin for generously mentoring and supporting pretenure faculty. For making sure I get money and supplies and generally understand how things are done, my eternal thanks to Jan Vander Meer and all the staff at NIU. Thanks to Deborah DeRosa, David Gorman, Kathleen Renk, and Diana Swanson for reading drafts of this material and offering advice and friendship. Elizabeth Schewe has read and reread multiple drafts of this manuscript and offered invaluable feedback and friendship. I am also grateful to J. D. Bowers, associate vice provost for University Honors, who offered sound advice on the shape of this manuscript and adeptly commented on drafts of this work, and to both J. D. and Anne Birberick, vice provost of academic affairs at NIU, for extending my transnational research and teaching opportunities by selecting me to lead NIU’s study-abroad program for honors students in Montreal.

I want to thank generous Chicago-area colleagues who have mentored and encouraged me along the way: Jim Chandler, Hillary Chute, Heather Keenleyside, Anna Kornbluh, Eric Slauter, Robin Valenza, Abram Van Engen, and Tim Yu. I am especially grateful for good conversations, convivial dinners, and play dates with Heather Keenleyside, Michael Green, and Wilder Keenleyside Green.

I have been fortunate to have benefited from the financial and intellectual support of many institutions. I am grateful to have received the Kenneth Johnston Dissertation Fellowship for Romantic Studies at Indiana University as well as a research and artistry grant from Northern Illinois University’s Office of Sponsored Projects, which enabled me to include the interviews with Mohawk community members in chapter 2. I first realized that I should go to Akwesasne while I was a participant in the 2010 National Endowment for the Humanities summer institute. program “From Metacom to Tecumseh: Early Native American Resistances Movements” at the Newberry Library led by Scott Stevens, then director of the Newberry’s Darcy McNickle Center for American Indian and Indigenous Studies. Many thanks to Scott and the wonderful staff at the Newberry, to the faculty who presented, and to my fellow participants. Thanks also to Rebecca Bales who initially encouraged me to get in contact with Mohawk leaders regarding my research interests. I presented early drafts of chapter 2 at the Newberry’s American Indian Studies Seminar Series (AISSS) and at Dartmouth College’s Futures of American Studies Summer Institute. Special thanks to LaVonne Ruoff at AISSS and Ivy Schweitzer at Dartmouth for your gracious mentoring and support of this work.

Spending time at Akwesasne gave me a new understanding of how and why research ought to be done. I would like to say nia:wen to the tribal staff who approved my research request, to Wolf Clan Faithkeeper Richard Mitchell, Bear Clan Mother Louise McDonald, and especially to Akwesasne Museum program coordinator Sue Ellen Herne for her assistance on the ground at Akwesasne. Thanks to all of you for sharing your knowledge with me; I am humbled to listen and share your words with others. For assistance in the Mohawk spelling of Handsome Lake’s “Good Message,” special thanks to Rohonwa’kiëh:rh at Akwesasne. You make your mom and your community proud! Thanks also to Mohawk storyteller Kay Olan for sharing stories with me and my NIU students and for many hours of good conversation.

I would like to offer special thanks to the Northern Illinois University library staff, especially Lynne Thomas at the Rare Books Room and the library’s digitization services staff for reproducing the images included in the book’s introduction. I would also like to thank several students for research assistance: Jonathan Pierrel at Ball State for translation assistance in chapter 3, Rachel Skinner at Northern Illinois University for transcribing the interviews in chapter 2, and Jen Fife for research assistance in chapter 5. For proofreading the earliest draft of this manuscript I owe many, many thanks to longtime friend and initial copy editor Rosemarie Connolly. Her suggestions and corrections enabled me to send the book out in a timely manner.

Special thanks to Richard Pult, Susan Abel, and everyone at UPNE who helped in the making and marketing of this book, and to the copyeditor, Anne Rogers, and indexer, Michael Tabor. I have been so pleased with the experience. I am most grateful to the Re-Mapping the Transnational series editor, Donald E. Pease, for helping this book to find a home.
A tremendous debt of gratitude goes to Ivy Schweitzer and Duncan Faherty for your thoughtful evaluations of this book; it is substantially stronger for your constructive feedback and sharp revision suggestions. Any failings are all my own. I thank the Johns Hopkins University Press for permission to reprint portions of chapter 3, which originally appeared as “Romantic Revolutions: Love and Violence in Leonora Sansay’s Secret History, or The Horrors of St. Domingo” in Studies in American Fiction 39, no. 2 (2012): 125–46.

Finally, thanks to my family for always cheering me on. My mother, Brenda Adams, never doubted that I could do this work. Her perseverance through life’s difficulties showed me the true meaning of strength. My father and stepmother, Chuck and Jacque Adams; my brother, Jeron Adams; and nephew, Damen Adams, have been supportive in every way. Thanks, too, to Betty Adams, Theresa Adams, Margaret Cooke, Cindy King, and Cheryl Moreno-Buxton for modeling what it means to be strong women. To Charles Adams, Tim Adams, Sam Buxton, Ray Cooke, and Scott King—thanks for your love. To the Fishers and Campbells, thank you for including me in your families; I am grateful every day for your kindness and warmth. My husband, Tim, has been there from the beginning, reading drafts and consistently giving the best feedback on my work. Thank you for sharing this life with me. My son, Charlie, is my constant joy. I am so grateful for you, dear boy. And although she will not arrive before this book goes into print, I welcome here our newest addition to the family.
