Kathryn Weedman Arthur is associate professor of anthropology in the Department of Society, Culture, and Language, University of South Florida, St. Petersburg. Over the last two decades she has conducted extensive ethnoarchaeological research in southern Ethiopia on lithic technology. Her publications and expertise span from gender and technology to community approaches in the study of sacred sites.

Catherine C. Carlson holds a Ph.D. in archaeology from the University of Massachusetts, Amherst. She has conducted field research in British Columbia for several decades and is now senior archaeology manager of a First Nations consulting company, Inlailawatash, owned by Tlseil-Waututh Nation in North Vancouver.

Audrey Horning is distinguished professor of anthropology at the College of William and Mary and professor of archaeology as well as Fellow, Senator George J. Mitchell Institute of Global Peace, Security, and Justice at Queen’s University Belfast, Northern Ireland. Her work spans the Atlantic, with archaeological investigations in the Chesapeake region and in colonial settings in Northern Ireland, the latter incorporating community engagements as a means of conflict transformation.

Alice B. Kehoe is professor emeritus of anthropology at Marquette University, Milwaukee, and research associate in anthropology at the University of Wisconsin, Milwaukee. She is the author of eighteen books and monographs, including The Land of Prehistory: A Critical History of American Archaeology. She started field research among the Blackfeet people in the late 1950s and has continued to be active in the archaeology and ethnohistory of the Great Plains.
STEPHEN A. MROZOWSKI is professor of anthropology and director of the Fiske Center for Archaeological Research at the University of Massachusetts, Boston. He has examined a broad spectrum of problems in historical archaeology in eastern North America and the Caribbean, ranging from boarding houses in industrial settings to plantation slavery, and more recently practicing community archaeology among Nipmuc descendants in Massachusetts.

GEORGE NICHOLAS is professor and chair of the Department of Archaeology at Simon Fraser University, Barnaby, British Columbia. He has published widely on indigenous and community archaeology for thirty years and developed and directed SFU’s Indigenous Archaeology Program on the Kamloops Indian Reserve. As director of the Intellectual Property Issues in Cultural Heritage (IPinCH) Project (2008–2016), he engaged in developing and nurturing community archaeology and heritage projects in international settings.

BILLY Ó FOGHLÚ is a Ph.D. candidate at the Australian National University. His research focuses on the northern Australia, working closely with Traditional Owners, the knowledge-keepers who understand the function of “mound sites” that heretofore have perplexed archaeologists.

INNOCENT PIKIRAYI is professor and chair of the Department of Anthropology and Archaeology, University of Pretoria, South Africa. He began his archaeological career in Zimbabwe, where he became engaged in the archaeology of the Mutapa state, in northern Zimbabwe. He is well known for his definitive research into Great Zimbabwe and for his groundbreaking community archaeology work in southern Africa.

PETER R. SCHMIDT is professor emeritus of anthropology and African Studies at the University of Florida and extraordinary professor of anthropology and archaeology at the University of Pretoria, South Africa. He began his studies of deep-time African history in 1966 when he was a student at Makerere University, Uganda. He is the author or editor of fifteen books, most recently focusing on community archaeology and heritage studies in Africa as well as ensuring that indigenous publications of oral traditions are accessible to wide international audiences.
Jonathan Walz is associate professor and academic director of the School for International Training in Zanzibar and research associate of the Field Museum, Chicago. He has engaged in long-term archaeological and ethnographic research in eastern Tanzania, publishing on his comprehensive surveys and findings that shed new light on the interior dimensions of Swahili civilization.

Camina Weasel Moccasin received her bachelor’s degree in archaeology and geography from the University of Lethbridge. She is a member of the Blackfoot Nation and uses traditional and archaeological knowledge to help people gain a deeper understanding of her ancestors and their way of life. Most recently she has worked as the manager of the Writing-on-Stone/Áísínai’pi Rock Art Monitoring Program as well as the head of education at Head-Smashed-In Buffalo Jump, UNESCO World Heritage Site, Alberta, Canada.

Jagath Weerasinghe is professor of archaeology and immediate past director of the Post Graduate Institute of Archaeology, University of Kilaniya, Colombo, Sri Lanka. One of Sri Lanka’s most prominent artists, he brings a diverse background to archaeology that includes art restoration and management of archaeology research at Sigiriya, a World Heritage Site.
