ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

Although it has taken on an entirely new form these many years later, the germ of this book was my PhD dissertation at George Washington University, so I must first thank the faculty members of the Department of American Studies for teaching me how to be a rigorous scholar, providing me with summer research grants, and generally creating the conditions under which I could carry out the necessary research to get this project going. I would especially like to thank my dissertation adviser, Joseph Kip Kosek, and the members of my dissertation committee, Elisabeth Anker and Chad Heap, for reading chapter drafts, taking time to help me work out ideas in meetings, and for supporting me over the years with so many letters of recommendation. I could not have conceived of the project or completed the thesis without them. I would also like to thank Dara Orenstein and Angela Zimmerman for reading my dissertation and offering trenchant comments and excellent suggestions for revisions at my defense. Jamie Cohen-Cole arrived in the department just as I was departing, but he was kind enough to invite me back for a seminar presentation, and his work on the history of social science has been an inspiration. Finally, I would like to thank my fellow graduate students in American Studies at GW for being such friendly, smart people who were always full of stimulating ideas and available for interesting conversations. Among these great minds I confess a particular affinity for the “meats” cohort of Emily Dufton, Meghan Drury, Katie Marages, and Bess Matassa, who always charmed me even in the depths of my despair.

I received a number of generous research travel grants both before and after the completion of the dissertation, which were essential for research that served as the foundation for this book. I am grateful for the grants for research at the following institutions: the Hartman Center for Sales, Advertising & Marketing History at Duke University; the Hagley Museum and Library in Wilmington, Delaware; the Rare Book and Manuscript Library at Columbia University; the American Heritage Center at the University of Wyoming; the Richard J. Daley Library Special Collections and University Archives at the University of Illinois, Chicago; the Special Collections Research Center at the University of Chicago Library; and the Rockefeller Archive Center in Sleepy Hollow, New York. Without exception, the librarians, archivists, and officers at these institutions were tremendously supportive in helping me to find what I was looking for and in pointing out the things that I didn’t know to look for but should have. Lee Hiltzik at the Rockefeller Archive Center was particularly helpful in guiding me to explore new avenues for my research through our conversations and collaboration on a research report.

I was the beneficiary of several dissertation fellowships that have afforded me the necessary time to complete research that would ultimately make its way into the book. These fellowships also introduced me to other established and emerging scholars who have stimulated my thinking in various ways. At the Hagley Museum and Library, where I was the recipient of the Henry Belin du Pont Dissertation Fellowship in Business, Technology, and Society, I am grateful to Roger Horowitz and Carol Lockman, who provided a pleasant environment for research and writing at the Library and at the “Blacksmith Shop,” the charming if slightly scary house for visiting scholars that I shared with another fellow, Mike McCarthy, who demonstrated the stimulative effect of political commitment on productive scholarship. I am extremely grateful to the Botstiber Institute for Austrian-American Studies, which provided essential support for nearly a year of research and writing, including trips to archives in Washington, D.C. and Vienna from my base in Montreal. The Studienstiftung des deutschen Volkes quite generously granted me a Leo Baeck Fellowship that was essential to completing the dissertation. At the fellowship workshops in Brighton and Oberwesel, I had the pleasure of meeting the other fellows, being introduced to their work, and receiving the very helpful comments on my project from Matthias Frenz of the Studienstiftung and Daniel Wildmann and Raphael Gross of the Leo Baeck Institute in London. The other fellows all had fascinating projects, but I found overlapping interest in the particularity of biography with the work of Amir Theilhaber.

Several postdoctoral fellowships allowed me to take the project in new directions that finally resulted in this book. At the Consortium for History of Science, Technology & Medicine in Philadelphia, where I was the recipient of a National Endowment for the Humanities fellowship, I am grateful to Babak Ashrafi, Sheila O’Shaughnessy, and Phillip Hohenberger for overseeing a great organization and creating the conditions for a solid year of productive scholarship. Through the J. Franklin Jameson Fellowship, the American Historical Association supported my time at the John W. Kluge Center at the Library of Congress, where I had the pleasure of meeting many bright scholars and fascinating people. Dana Schaffer at the AHA made sure that my fellowship time went smoothly, and I am particularly grateful to Kluge fellows Lanie Millar and Samira Mehta, who lent me reassurance during a rather ominous period. I had a wonderful experience as the Fulbright-Botstiber Visiting Professor of Austrian-American Studies at the University of Vienna, where Alexandra Ganzer and Monika Wittmann of the Department of English and American Studies nicely integrated me into the department as I went about my teaching and research, and Waldemar Zacharasiewicz kindly invited me to give a talk at the Austrian Academy of Sciences. Susanne Hamscha and Lonnie Johnson of Fulbright Austria did wonderful work guiding and motivating the visiting American scholars, and I remember fondly many dinner parties and outings with fellow Fulbrighters Lisa Feurzeig, Jesse Feiman, Tom Tierney, Thom Prendergast, and Melissa Danas.

I am once again grateful to the Botstiber Foundation for sponsoring my fellowship at the Institute for Advanced Study at Central European University in Budapest, where I was able to complete the last major portion of the writing of this book. Nadia Al-Bagdadi was an inspiring leader of the IAS, and I was greatly assisted by the officers Krisztina Domján, Andrey Demidov, and Ágnes Bendik. Ágnes Forgó made sure that my stay at the Raoul Wallenberg Guesthouse was thoroughly pleasant. Our weekly seminars and long lunches were a delight, and I had the pleasure of learning from and getting to know many of the other fellows, including Audrey Anton, Zoltán Kékesi, Stephen Kershner, Suzy Kim, László Munteán, Dalia Neis, Max Rosochinsky, and Mor Segev. My fellow Botstiber fellow Christiane Tewinkel provided much advice and encouragement, and Gabriel Cepaluni was an inspiration as an enthusiastic adventurer in the city. Dieter Reinisch made me espressos for late nights at the office, and Ibukun Filani dropped by my apartment almost daily after the Covid-19 pandemic had arrived, just to chat and check my sanity. Fardin Alikhah, Oksana Maksymchuk, and Melanie Sindelar were also important presences in the Guesthouse. It was quite a pity when the virus struck and ended our regular meetings, but at least it allowed me another six weeks to write before flights out of Budapest finally resumed.

Over the years I have presented various aspects of this project at many conferences and workshops, and I am grateful for the many comments, suggestions, and critiques that have helped me to improve this book. Early on, at a panel at the US Intellectual History Conference organized by Andrew Hartman, David Steigerwald encouraged me to investigate the career of Paul Lazarsfeld, which ended up giving shape and direction to the book. At the Business History Conference and at subsequent workshops, and in a contribution to an edited vol-
I have had the pleasure of getting to know Jan Logemann, whose work on émigrés and consumer culture has much overlap with my own. Atiba Pertilla, whom I first met at the Business History Conference, has offered guidance and has alerted me to some key opportunities. Andrea Westermann has helped me to sharpen this project as both an editor and as the convener of the Bucerius Young Scholar Forum at the Pacific Regional Office of the German Historical Institute. Kristina Poznan helped me with Hungarian pronunciation at a conference sponsored by the IAS and the Botstiber Institute, and later she provided clarity to an article of mine on Moholy-Nagy, which she edited for the Journal of Austrian-American Studies. Jeff Pooley, whom I first met at the History of Recent Social Science Conference in Paris, and who later edited an article of mine for the International Journal of Communication, has helped me to sharpen my understanding the work of Paul Lazarsfeld, which transcends so many fields.

Finally, I would like to thank the many excellent journal editors and anonymous readers—including the two incisive readers of the manuscript for this very book—who have helped me to improve various aspects of this project over the years. They are too numerous to mention individually, but I must especially thank Linda Kunos, my editor at CEU Press, who listened to my pitch in Budapest, took an interest in the project, and has guided it to completion.

Last, but not least, I am eternally grateful to my wife, Josie Torres Barth, whose university library privileges I have mercilessly exploited over the years as my own have come and gone, and without whom I would literally not have been able to complete this book. Josie is a stellar scholar and a trivia master, which is just the kind of person you’d like to have around when working out ideas for a book.
