I would like to extend my thanks to a number of scholars to whom I am deeply indebted for their feedback and support during the process of completing the present book: Peter Adamson (Ludwig-Maximilians-Universität), who directed the doctoral dissertation on which this book is based, for his guidance and his honest advice on my dissertation from the earliest stages until its completion; the members of my doctoral dissertation committee, John Marenbon (Cambridge University) and Lydia Schumacher (King’s College, London), whose suggestions were important for the final shaping of the present book; Christopher Cullen (Fordham University), who provided me with my first opportunity to study the philosophy of Bonaventure while I was completing my undergraduate studies, and who also provided excellent comments on the book manuscript; Fabrizio Amerini (Università degli Studi di Parma), who reviewed the manuscript for Leuven University Press, for his careful assessment which was invaluable in my revision process; and Russell Friedman (KU Leuven), the series editor, for his feedback on drafts of the manuscript and for his care and attention to my book in its final stages.
