I owe great thanks to interviewees—Africa correspondents from eleven major European and North American newspapers, as well as Sudan and Darfur specialists at foreign ministries and with sections of Amnesty International and Doctors Without Borders in most of the eight countries I examined. They must remain unnamed as I promised anonymity. In some cases I may even have manipulated their gender attribution to inhibit identification. Many others—scholars, administrators, librarians, and archivists—contributed valuable information.

I thank my research team, a hardworking group of then–graduate students from the sociology (Abby Hagel, Ryan Moltz, Hollie Nyseth Brehm), political science (Brooke Coe, Henry Thomson), and history departments (Ed Snyder) at the University of Minnesota. They diligently coded 3,387 media articles. Reliability tests show how solidly they worked. Precious undergraduate student assistance, supported by the University of Minnesota’s Undergraduate Research Opportunity Program, was provided by Patrick Alcorn, Victoria Dutcher, Taylor Yess, and Meghan Zacher (Meghan with the support of a National Science Foundation Research Experiences for Undergraduates grant). Graduate student Suzy Maves McElrath, supported by the University of Minnesota’s Center for German and European Studies, coded foreign ministry press releases and helped coordinate the undergraduate work. Erez Garnai, also a graduate student in sociology at Minnesota, contributed to artwork as well as the front matter. Within the research assistant team, Hollie Nyseth Brehm stood out. A (by now former) doctoral co-advisee, since fall 2014 on the sociology faculty of The Ohio State University, she helped develop the code book, coordinate the work of the coder team, and organize the data set, and contributed to data collection and analysis with great skill and seemingly unlimited energy. Collaboration with Hollie resulted in a coauthored article in the American Journal of Sociology (Vol. 121, No. 2, 2015), where we apply advanced statistical methods to some of the data presented in this book.

Research underlying this book is based primarily on funding by the National Science Foundation, Law and Social Science Program (Grant No. SES-0957946). The University of Minnesota and its College of Liberal Arts granted me supplemental funding during a 2010–11 sabbatical year and a Faculty Development Leave in 2013–14. The sabbatical allowed me to travel across seven European countries to conduct field research and interviews, while the Institute for Social Sciences at Humboldt Universität in Berlin hosted me generously. I am indebted to Klaus Eder, the institute’s director at the time, and Hans Bertram, who provided office space and made his infrastructure available. During the Faculty Development Leave, I was a Fellow at the Käte Hamburger Center for Advanced Study in the Humanities “Law as Culture” at the Friedrich-Wilhelm Universität in Bonn. I owe great thanks to Werner Gephart, its director; to Raja Sakrani, its academic program director; to its academic and support staff; and to my fellow Fellows from five disciplines, eight countries, and six continents. They shielded me against many risks of parochialism in academic work. A German version of this book is forthcoming in the Käte Hamburger Center’s series with Vittorio Klostermann Publisher, Frankfurt am Main. Finally, the Rockefeller Foundation funded a 2010 collaborative fellowship, with John Hagan and Jens Meierhenrich, and a 2012 conference, Representations of Darfur, that our trio organized at its Bellagio Center. The conference allowed us to bring together scholars, journalists, Sudanese opposition activist-journalists, ICC staff, and leading diplomats from the Bill Clinton and George W. Bush administrations.

I presented parts of this work at numerous places, including annual meetings of the American Sociological Association; the Law & Society Association; the American Society of Criminology; the Research Council for the Sociology of Law at its 2013 Toulouse meetings; the 2013 Legal Frames of Memory conference in Warsaw; the 2012 Rockefeller Bellagio conference; the 2013 conference “The Memory of Trauma: After the Holocaust and an Era of Genocides,” organized by the Humanities Institute and the Department for Jewish Studies at the University of California, Davis; the 2013 Representations of Genocide conference, which I coorganized with Alejandro Baer, Director of the Center for Holocaust and Genocide Studies at the University of Minnesota; workshops in the sociology departments of Johannes-Gutenberg Universität in Mainz, Karl-Franzens-Universität Graz, and the University of Minnesota; the Institute for Diaspora and Genocide Research at the Ruhr Universität Bochum; All Souls College and the Institute of Criminology at Oxford University; a Punishment & Society conference at the University of Edinburgh; the Käte Hamburger Center for Advanced Study in the Humanities “Law as Culture” in Bonn; and the Käte Hamburger Centre for Global Cooperation Research in Duisburg. Everywhere I received deserved critiques and helpful suggestions. My expression of gratitude for inspiration or hospitality has to be selective, but I will at least mention Martin Albrow, Alejandro Baer, Marta Bucholc, Mirhan Dabag, Nina Dethloff, Noemi Gal-Or, David Garland, Werner Gephart (again), John Hagan, Marina Hennig, Matthias Herdegen, Philipp Kuntz, Ian Loader, Jens Meierhenrich, Mark Osiel, Leigh Payne, Devin Pendas, Kristin Platt, Birgit Schwelling, Kathryn Sikkink, Richard Sparks, Natan Sznaider, Annette Weber, and Diane Wolf. A number of colleagues and friends read all or part of the manuscript: Shai Dromi, Erez Garnai, Shannon Golden, Matthias Herdegen, Ryan D. King, Matthias Revers, Rebecca Savigsberg, and Philip Smith. Anonymous reviewers for the University of California Press read the prospectus as well as the manuscript; each provided helpful suggestions. My profound thanks go to all of them and to others who contributed in manifold ways. Any remaining mistakes, of course, are mine.

At Minnesota, I thank Jim Parente, who, as Dean of the College of Liberal Arts and, jointly with Michal Kobialka, as Associate Dean for Faculty, supported several of the initiatives mentioned above. I was honored when Dean Parente offered me, in 2013, the Arsham and Charlotte Ohanessian Chair, dedicated to research and service in the name of human rights. I gratefully accepted, and work on judicial and legislative struggles over the history of the Armenian genocide is under way. My gratitude goes to the Ohanessian Fund and family.

At the University of California Press, Maura Roessner and her team, including Glynnis Koike, Elena McAnespie, Jessica Moll, and Jack Young, helped with enthusiasm and great professionalism. Steven B. Baker did outstanding work as copyeditor.
Finally, as always, Pamela Feldman-Savelsberg accompanied me through the process of researching and writing. I can never count the conversations, moments of frank critique, and precious advice that accumulate along the way. The last year of writing was accompanied by new life, by saved life, and by death among those closest to us. Millions of distant lives, saved and destroyed, of those who suffer from the greatest human rights violations, unnamed and unknown to us and the readers, and the struggle over their acknowledgment and representation are what this book is about.
