With every book, many obligations are incurred, and its publication offers the welcome opportunity to express one's gratitude to the people who have made it possible. In my case, the debts extend back to the days when this book was a dissertation. To Michael P. Rogin I owe my first debt of gratitude, for bringing Bourne's work to my attention and for encouraging me to continue to research his political thought during my graduate years at the University of California, Berkeley. Mike Rogin makes the study of political theory an intensely personal and politically challenging experience, as much by his example as by what he teaches. Other teachers at the University of California, Berkeley, particularly Norman Jacobson, Hannah Pitkin, and D. Paul Thomas also transmitted their enthusiasm for and knowledge of political theory that continues to inspire me.

My adviser at the University of Chicago, the late J. David Greenstone, encouraged me to write a master's thesis on pragmatism. His intelligence, deep humanity, and democratic sensibilities continue to light the way for all of us who were fortunate to have known or worked with him. David Tracy also brought new insight into the philosophy of William James and helped me draw out its connections to modern and postmodern thought. My dissertation advisers—Mike Rogin, Norman Jacobson, and Carolyn Porter—advised me through the stages of research and writing with patience and encouragement. Berkeley graduate student colleagues, including Patricia Boling, Nancy Haggard-Gilson, Penelope Hanan-Dahmen, Sheryl Lutjens, and George Shulman, assisted with revisions of several portions of the dissertation. I also wish to thank the members of the West Coast editorial collective of the New Political Science who took seriously the Bourneian critique of the role of intellectuals in modern war during the “Vietnamization” of our own war, including Sheryl Lutjens, Michael W. McCann, Michael MacDonald, Jonas Pontusson, George Shulman, Sven Steinmo, and D. Paul Thomas.

My colleagues at Macalester College have been a source of strength and encouragement. My deepest gratitude goes to Norman L. Rosenberg, who is in every sense a mentor, an adviser, and an invaluable friend, not only for his many suggestions for the work as a whole but also for his support throughout its long gestation. Without him, this book would not have been written. I am grateful to Donald R. Culverson, Roxanne Gudeman, Michal M. McCall, Darrell Moore, Norman Rosenberg, Sanford Schram, and Joelle Vitiello for reading earlier versions of Chapters 6 and 7 and gave sound and critical advice. Members of the faculty writing group at Macalester College, including Adrienne Christiansen, Beth Cleary, Ruthanne Godellei, Roxanne Gudeman, Michal M. McCall, Darrell Moore, Rhona Leibel, Clay Steinman, and Joelle Vitiello, created a genuine intellectual community, a difficult accomplishment at best in a climate of competing obligations for faculty. Charles R. Green and Rhona Leibel were forgiving of my lapses as a teacher and colleague as I made the final revisions of this manuscript. Michal M. McCall, my dear and devoted friend and adviser, and Paul L. Murphy deserve special thanks for their support and assistance, and I am grateful for and strengthened by their confidence.

For research assistance, I wish to thank Alejandro Aguilera, Katherine Eckland, Amanda Humpage, Hideo Kobata, Mpho Leseka, and Genevieve Warwick. Roxanne Fisher in the Department of Political Science at Macalester College guided us through our tasks with tireless patience, humor, and sound advice. I would also like to acknowledge the students in my American political thought class of 1995, especially Christopher Teske, for interrogating Bourne’s ideas about transnationalism and his critique of pragmatism, and I am grateful for the privilege of working with students at Macalester College and the University of Minnesota, Duluth.

Thomas Bender of New York University generously read the entire manuscript and offered critical suggestions on an earlier version of Chapter 7, as did members of his 1989 NEH seminar Cities, Biographies, and Texts, including Janet Noever, Jennifer Bradley, Donald Marti, and Ted Wolner. From different disciplines, we managed to form a cohesive and imaginative group of scholars with a common interest in the cultural politics of cities. Their intelligence and energy have sustained me in my continuing exploration of American progressivism.

I would also like to thank Donald R. Culverson, Tom Bender, Donald Marti, R. Jeffrey Lustig, Norman Rosenberg, Sanford Schram, and Michael Weinstein for reading and offering incisive and detailed comments on portions of the manuscript. Benedetto Fontana and Susan Abrams Beck provided steady encouragement and specific suggestions on the writing process.

I extend my enduring, loving, but inadequate thanks to my father, Sam Vaughan, who is an editor and publisher. His position was the most difficult of all, as I insisted that he read the manuscript as my father and not as my editor. Fortunately, he did not listen, and his impeccable editorial judgment remained uncompromised. My family gave me steady and uncompromised support, offering encouragement and presumptive confidence at every turn. My mother, Josephine LoBiondo Vaughan, always asked the penetrating question about the book, usually the one I could not answer or did not think to ask. Jeffrey M. Vaughan, David S. Vaughan, and Dana A. Vaughan provided the needed perspectives on how to approach this project and generously advised me on ways to navigate the competing demands made of a junior faculty member. David Vaughan’s sensitive photography reminds me that one’s work is never solitary but always a collaborative, indeed, a family affair. I am also grateful to Leonard LoBiondo for his constant and intelligent advice and support. My thanks and deep affection for Mike go beyond his providing me with an anchor and his understanding and patience.

I have been privileged to have Wilson Carey McWilliams and Lance Banning as my editors in the American Political Thought series at the University Press of Kansas as they could not have been more demanding, more knowledgeable, or more generous in their meticulous reading of the manuscript. Press of Kansas, has been a constant and gentle guiding force from the very beginning of this project, answering innumerable and bothersome questions with grace, clarity, and patience. The staff at the press offered expert assistance at every stage.

A different version of Chapter 6 was presented at the annual convention of the American Political Science Association in 1992 as “A Post-Liberal Pragmatism? The Case of Randolph Bourne and World War I.” Earlier versions of Chapter 7 were given at the annual convention of the American Culture Association in 1990 as “‘Trans-National America’: Another Look at Cultural Pluralism” and published in 1991 in the Journal of American Studies as “Cosmopolitanism, Ethnicity, and American Identity: Randolph Bourne’s ‘Trans-National America’” (25[3]: 443–59). I would also like to acknowledge the helpful suggestions of anonymous readers of the Journal of Politics and American Quarterly for their contributions to revised versions of Chapters 6 and 7, respectively.

The New Jersey Historical Commission, the National Endowment for the Humanities, and the University of Minnesota’s Faculty Grant Program provided partial funding for my research, and Macalester College’s junior-faculty leave program afforded me the opportunity to concentrate on scholarly pursuits free from the obligations of teaching. Kenneth Lohf and the staff at the Rare Books and Manuscripts Library, Butler Library, Columbia University, were helpful in making Bourne’s papers available and for granting permission to quote from archival material. I would also like to thank Neda Westlake at the Van Pelt Library, University of Pennsylvania; Amy Stark of the Center for Creative Photography, University of Arizona; and Edward C. Carter II and his staff at the American Philosophical Society Library, Philadelphia, for access to Bourne’s letters and permission to quote from them. I am grateful to all of them for their ready assistance and courtesies.

For the inevitable omissions and errors, I am, of course, fully responsible.
