could not have finished Where the World Is Not: Cultural Authority and Democratic Desire in Modern American Literature without the help and support of many people. It would be virtually impossible to list them all here. Nonetheless, I will attempt to thank some of the people who contributed to the process.

Early attempts at formulating the ideas in this book were encouraged by Michael T. Gilmore, Jacqueline Jones, Eugene Goodheart, and Wai Chee Dimock. These inspirational scholars provided invaluable critiques of my work and helped, periodically, to renew my confidence in the project. Bryan Reynolds, scholar and lifelong comrade, also maintained a strong belief in this book and did not accept any excuses from me, period.

Each member of my family—my dear five brothers (Kenny, Eric, Daniel, Gary, and Brian) and my dedicated father, Robert Savelson, plus my in-law sisters—have supported me in big and small ways, all being the kind of family members who give “family” a good name. And even though she is no longer “with” us, I could not go without thanking the most influential artist and writer in my life, my mother, Dede. Dede, whose life was cut short just as I was accepting my first academic appointment, was my very close friend as well as my parent; she was a tireless source of emotional support, intellectual vigor, artistic vision, and humor. I miss talking with her every single day, and continue to try to live with her energy and creativity. Lucky for me that I have friends like Michele Moe and Karen Teicher, who have made life full and fun, even though we rarely see each other. And thanks to Dana Weintraub, who has helped make our new home a warmer place since we moved. Once arriving at Stanford, I found my new academic home, the Program in Writing and Rhetoric, to be a superb community of scholars and teachers; I am very grateful to Andrea Lunsford and Marvin Diogenes for creating and nurturing this cooperative, dynamic community. Thanks to them, the Stanford Program in Writing and Rhetoric is truly remarkable.

At The Ohio State University Press, Heather Lee Miller was an early supporter of the project, combining a professional enthusiasm for my scholarly research with a personal interest in discussing our newborns. Later, expert editor Sandy Crooms took over at The Ohio State University Press, bringing the perfect set of skills to keep the momentum rolling. She deserves my warmest thanks. In addition to applying a sharp editorial eye, Sandy has been resolute, remarkably patient, and continuously motivating. She somehow was convinced I could finish this book while teaching and taking care of two young children. Sandy remained hopeful about the project even as I worked slowly, balancing my time between the book, my students, and the wonderful and amazing Noah and Ella.

I happily thank Noah and Ella, my darling kids, for being magnificent people and for understanding my need to work; I could not ask for sweeter or more exciting, adorable, sparkling children. They are a daily inspiration; they are my heart’s delight.

Finally, for the things he has brought me, I am of course grateful to Todd Wright. Our life together has been a wild adventure since that day we met in front of Wright Field. Thank you, Todd. And long live Saltaire, Fire Island!
