Detecting the Nation
Reitz, Caroline

Published by The Ohio State University Press

Reitz, Caroline.
Detecting the Nation: Fictions of Detection and the Imperial Venture.
Project MUSE. muse.jhu.edu/book/28314.

For additional information about this book
https://muse.jhu.edu/book/28314

For content related to this chapter
https://muse.jhu.edu/related_content?type=book&id=1177475
ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

This book was written while moving almost as much as the Victorian detective: from Providence to Cambridge to New York to Cincinnati, and, finally, to St. Louis. And much like the detective, I needed the help of a large, sympathetic public to wrap up my investigations—and to remember where I lived. I must express my deepest thanks to Nancy Armstrong, who, as adviser of this work when it was a doctoral dissertation at Brown University, provided the perfect blend of insightful commentary, necessary skepticism, and good will. I can only hope, by way of thanks, to be the kind of rigorous, unflaggingly supportive adviser to my own students that Nancy has been to me. Bill Keach and Bob Scholes, from opposite ends of that long nineteenth century, added invaluable readings of my project at various stages. And from opposite ends of a sticky restaurant table, members of the Victorian Readers Group at Brown added important perspectives not only on this research but on the reasons for sticking with it: Lois Cucullu, Nick Daly, Julia Flanders, Ivan Kreilkamp, and Jennifer Ruth. I would like to thank many comrades at large, John Marx, Heather Hirschfeld, Carolyn Vellenga Berman, Tim Carens, and Kenneth Brewer, as well as the many readers of this manuscript, Ed Wiltse, Maire ni Fhlaithuin, Kathy Psomiades, Daniel Cottom, and Julian Wolfreys. Donald E. Hall, the editor of The Ohio State University’s Victorian Critical Interventions series, has been a model of encouragement and editorial speed. I thank him both for his attention to my manuscript and for the series. I would like to thank the press’s anonymous readers for their many helpful suggestions, and the following editors at the press for their hard work and patience: Heather Lee Miller, Eugene O’Connor, and Leslie Evans.

I am thankful for the support and enthusiasm of my new colleagues here at Saint Louis University and in particular my chair, Sara van den Berg. I gratefully acknowledge the library staffs at Brown University, the New York Public Library, and Saint Louis University. Grants from Brown and Saint Louis University made possible the initial research and the polishing of the manuscript respectively. Finally I am grateful to the editors of the following xii

Acknowledgments

journals for allowing permission to reprint previously published articles as revised portions of chapters 1 and 3:

While Sue Grafton and “Prime Suspect” might have had something to do with this book on the detective, it wouldn’t be what it is and I wouldn’t be who I am without the following very special teachers, who not only taught me how to read literature but, more importantly, showed me the relationship between literature and the larger world: Cynthia Briggs; Jeff Nunokawa; Nancy Armstrong, who read every word of this manuscript countless times; Bart Reitz, who thinks about literature from the vantage point of the larger world; and Nan Reitz, who has read every word of my writing since Carlos Brown was only a baby. My sister, Elizabeth Reitz Mullenix, is a role model in her work and in her life. It is one of my great joys to be in the same profession with her. My in-laws, Myra and Warren Widmann, have known me since before I was an English major, and I am thankful for their faith in a process which frequently seemed perverse even to me. Doug Widmann has been more supportive than words can express, spending many years in a crowded New York apartment watching me read and write and then spending a few more watching our sons so I could read and write. And finally, for those sons who seem to have inherited a maternal love of detective stories: Will, whose gimlet gaze misses less than Bucket, and Max, who is always in search of the third clue.