A book like this is the end product of a long and iterative process, which means that there are many people who helped along the way and deserve thanks.

This began as my doctoral dissertation, and many members of the faculty, as well as fellow graduate students, in the School of Public Affairs at American University made a contribution at one point or another. Tricia Patterson first suggested to me that a pending Supreme Court case on fetal protection policies might present an interesting public policy dilemma to study. My faculty advisor, Patricia Sykes, provided further encouragement, as did Neil Kerwin, Jerome Hanus, and David Rosenbloom. I am, of course, particularly indebted to the members of my dissertation committee: Gregg Ivers, Ron Shaiko, and Karen O’Connor. I could not have assembled a more ideal and complementary set of minds to advise a work on interest group litigation.

By the time the dissertation was completed, I was working full time at the Jacobs Institute of Women’s Health in Washington, D.C., and its Executive Director, Martha Romans, provided the support and flexibility to allow me to bring the endeavor to fruition. As an adjunct faculty member at American University I had the opportunity to continue to develop some of the themes contained herein with the students in my Politics of Reproduction classes. While they are too numerous to name individually, I extend my thanks to them as well. The project evolved from a dissertation into a book manuscript during my tenure at the Washington Business Group on Health. Both Dr. Mary Jane England, immediate past president of WBGH, and Helen Darling, the current president, not only tolerated but supported my chronic distractions of teaching, writing, and attending law school. For this I am grateful.

Naturally before I had the privilege of meeting and working with these professional colleagues, I enjoyed the love, support, and encouragement of my family. My parents instilled in me from an early age the essential value of education and pushed me to go as far as I possibly could. My mother, Dr. Susan J. Duvé, remains my original and most enduring role model. Her self-motivation and determination carried her through medical school at a time when she had few women as classmates or mentors. Her premature passing was a loss that cannot be measured. My father, Dr. Jay Gonen, provided a further model of a working professional with intellectual and academic pursuits, and he continues to encourage me to this day. My brother, David, now also pursuing a law degree, has grown into a worthy intellectual sparring partner and a great friend, and I thank him for his support as well.

My deepest thanks of all go to Becky Bonzano, whose love and encouragement as a partner and best friend sustained me through the simultaneous pursuit of a law degree and this book. She shared in the sacrifice, tolerating late nights and weekends devoid of recreation, and I will be forever grateful.
