This book grew out of my doctoral dissertation, and some of my gratitude and intellectual debts go a long way back. Robert Woods inspired me, as he has so many undergraduates at Pomona, with a fascination for British history, and in particular the history of law and legal institutions. Without having chanced into his freshman seminar in 1986, I would not have thought to become a historian, and he has continued as informal mentor and friend since then. Peter Stansky was and remains a warm, generous, and supportive advisor, to the graduate student as well as the young faculty member making his professional way in the world. Anthony Brundage, John Beattie, Simon Devereaux, Clive Emsley, Douglas Haynes, Joanna Innes, and Elaine Reynolds all contributed in different ways to making this a better project than would have otherwise been the case. Vivian Aldous and the other archivists at the Corporation of London Record Office provided invaluable and courteous service. My colleagues in the history department at Bridgewater State College have provided a collegial and encouraging working environment. Many good friends have directly and indirectly made this book possible; my English department colleague Ann Brunjes and her husband, Peter Colombotos, as well as Nina, Olivia and Julia, have become so positive a part of my family’s lives since we moved to Massachusetts that I can hardly imagine having accomplished anything without their warmth.

I am grateful to the Center for the Advancement of Research and Teaching at Bridgewater State College as well as the Department of History, both of which funded the project’s completion. Versions of material in chapters 1–3 appeared in an article in the London Journal vol. 28, no. 2 (2003) as “Policing and Public Order in the City of London, 1784–1815,” for which I gratefully acknowledge permission to reprint here.

I thank the editors at Ohio State University Press, Heather Lee Miller and Eugene O’Connor, as well as the History of Crime and Criminal Justice series editors David Johnson and Jeffrey Adler, for their professionalism and for their support of this project. Thanks also to Bob Schwarz for his thoughtful and meticulous handling of the index.

My parents, Ted and Gilda Harris, provided support of many kinds over the years. My wife, Laurie Stuhlbarg, has given such unstinting couragement that words cannot do justice to it; she also read much of this book many times over and in many forms, providing insights large and small even after I wearied of it. As I write this, my son Eli turns one, and in his attempts to consume parts of the manuscript in its final stages, he demonstrated to me that it was time to be done. For this, and for a world of other wondrous things, I am grateful to him.
