In writing this book, I have enjoyed support, encouragement, and constructive criticism from many sources. The policies for junior faculty course and service release in the Ohio State University College of Arts and Sciences and Department of Germanic Languages and Literatures have given me the time I needed to write this book. Many friends and colleagues have read portions of the text at various stages and have provided valuable feedback. I thank them and look forward to continuing our writing exchanges in the future: Naomi Brenner, Sarah Copland, Jens Klenner, Bernhard and Marie Malkmus, May Mergenthaler, Kristin Rebien, Rob Schechtman, Megan Ward, and Chantelle Warner. Others gave valuable responses to presentations: Silke Horstkotte, Barbara Kosta, Erin McGlothlin, Leo Riegert, Johannes Türk, and James A. van Dyke. My dissertation committee members, Chana Kronfeld, Elaine Tennant, and Robert Holub, offered comments and advice that guided the first steps of my revisions and expansions. Robert Holub also read parts of the book manuscript and provided strategic advice about presenting the project; I am grateful for his ongoing mentorship. I owe deep thanks to the four readers who reviewed the manuscript for The Ohio State University Press, all of whom read it exceptionally carefully, and with an eye to helping me improve and better communicate my argument: James Phelan, Peter Rabinowitz, Irene Kacandes, and Scott Denham. James Phelan deserves particular recognition and gratitude for the encouragement he has offered since I first approached him about my project several years ago, and for his generosity with his time and advice during the revision process. The two acquisitions editors with whom I have worked at OSU Press, Sandy Crooms and Lindsay Martin, have been extremely responsive and helpful as I have prepared the manuscript for submission.

All of these people helped make the book better. A number of other people have made it possible. My parents, Will and Joan Byram, always told me I could go wherever I wanted to go and gave me everything they could to help me get there, from self-confidence to a warm sleeping bag to babysitting and dinners cooked after work. I could not have finished the book when I did (and maybe not at all) without the practical advice and daily encouragement I received from my online and on-site writing groups: Fiona, Sharon, TP, TB, MMFS, Lynn, Badia, profmaman, Adriana, Helen, Liza, Sylvia, Sophia, and Sarah, you know who you are. My children, Abram and Helena, have given me a reason to buckle down and write so I can go home and do other things. Finally, my husband, Todd, has challenged me whenever I didn’t make sense or wasn’t being clear; pushed me to trust my instincts and interpretations; shared the demands of the work/life balance; and, while being silly with me, always taken my work seriously.
