I can begin by thanking Malcolm Litchfield and Ethan Knapp at The Ohio State University Press for their support, which buoyed me on to this conclusion. Thanks to Rick Emmerson for my being a medievalist at all; nor would I be here without the inspiration of Jocelyn Wogan-Browne, Caroline Walker Bynum, and Bob Hanning. Also deserving thanks is my dissertation committee: Patricia Dailey, Paul Strohm, and especially my chair, Susan Crane, for assembling the groundbreaking syllabus that inspired this project, for her extraordinary patience while I struggled to give shape to a heap of words, and for her continuing support in the years since I finished my degree. Thanks to my dissertation’s outside readers, Timea Szell and Samuel Moyn: I hope the project will strike you as much improved since you last saw it. Thanks to Margaret Aziza Pappano and Helen Tiffin, whose invitation to present my work at Queen’s University in 2005 catalyzed my research into an argument.

Several of my Brooklyn College colleagues have been happy to talk posthumanism and animals with me, including Samir Chopra, Scott Dexter, Mobina Hashmi, Amy Hughes, Nicola Masciandaro (Brooklyn’s own hairy saint), Craig Williams, and Bob Viscusi, who did me the honor of letting me run a Wolfe Seminar on Critical Animal Theory in Fall 2009. Thanks to Christopher Ebert for Portuguese folklore, and Danielle Kellogg for the verb “caraxantur.” Thanks to the students in my “Saints, Monsters, and Animals in the Middle Ages” course, who suffered my excitement by being forced to read and write far too much: I would have been much happier if I’d had you for six months! Thanks to the Brooklyn College Interlibrary Loan staff, whose efforts on my behalf have been truly heroic: I could not have asked for more if I had the staff all to myself, and, at times, it very nearly seemed I did. Thanks to the City University of New York for two PSC-CUNY summer salary grants, two New Faculty Fund awards, and thanks above all to my academic union (PSC-CUNY/AFT) for winning junior faculty pretenure release time, without which I could never have written this book. More thanks to CUNY for allowing me to participate in the Faculty Fellowship Publication Program, where I benefited from conversations with Al Coppola, JoEllen Delucia, Kristina Richardson, Ramesh Mallipeddi, Andrea Walkden, and our tireless moderator, Brij Singh.

Unlimited thanks to Jeffrey Jerome Cohen for the invitation in September 2006 to join him online at In the Middle (www.inthemedievalmiddle.com). His friendship and enthusiasm, on and offline, have been of inestimable value to me, as they have been to so many others: you’re a model scholar and a stand-up guy. Thanks to my other co-bloggers, Mary Kate Hurley and Eileen Joy. Eileen, I will always love tangling with you. Thanks for everything, but thanks most of all for the Babel Working Group, for postmedieval, for always swerving at things from another direction. You’re great, and so are our friends and co-conspirators: with Anna Kłosowska, Betsy McCormick, Christine Neufeld, Myra Seaman, and Marty Shichtman, I could conquer the world or at least Kalamazoo. Thanks to the medieval blog world and academics on various other social-media platforms. Without your help, curiosity, and provocation, my world would be so much lonelier: thanks, then, to Another Damned Medievalist, Rob Barrett, Martha Bayless, Liza Blake, Beth Bonnette, Brantley Bryant, Greg Carrier, Matt Chrulew, Holly Crocker, Christina M. FitzGerald, Martin Foys, Matthew Gabriele, Richard Godden, Brandon Hawk, Marcus Hensel, Cary Howie, Jonathan Hsy, Sylvia Huot, Dan Kline, Scott Korb, Jonathan Jarrett, Stephanie Johnson, Sarah Rees Jones, Steve Mulhberger, Robin Norris, Megan Nowell, Julie Orlemanski, Carl Prydum, Masha Raskolnikov, Dan Remein, Adam Roberts, Michael O’Rourke, Mike Smith, Alan Stewart, and Larry Swain. Thanks to the College of the Holy Cross and above all Sarah Stanbury for the retreat in Rhode Island, where I talked animals for a weekend with some of the folks above as well as with Sarah Kay, Gary Lim, Peggy McCracken, and Peter Travis.

Closest to home, thanks to Alison Kinney. I wish all academics my good fortune of having so near at hand a brilliant writer, willing to lend time and a skeptical brain. I can only wonder how many times she’s read this book, or how many red pens she’s worn out on it. There’s no way to thank her adequately for her forbearance, for her thinking through this with and often ahead of me, and for her painstaking untangling of stylistic and logical faults except to say that she has proved to be my work’s, and my, salvation.
