This book has benefited from the help and encouragement of many institutions and individuals. We would like to thank our colleagues at Troy University's Department of History and the University of South Carolina Upstate's English Department for their collegiality and suggestions in the development of this project. USC Upstate's Office of Sponsored Awards and Research Support and the Center for Undergraduate Research and Scholarship provided funding for its completion. Riché Richardson and Jim Sidbury have shaped this collection in both direct and indirect ways, and we are grateful for their assistance, particularly Riché's eloquent postscript. The outside reviewers for The Ohio State University Press provided invaluable recommendations in shaping this book, and Sandy Crooms, Maggie Diehl, Malcolm Litchfield, and the entire staff of the Press remain the finest editors for which we could hope. Former USC Upstate undergraduate student Rachel McAllister provided important assistance in conducting the research for the introduction. Parts of chapter 1 were previously published in the Journal of Southern History. The University of North Carolina Chapel Hill Libraries provided permission to reprint images, while the Wofford College Sandor Teszler Library made other resources available. We are both indebted to the Buckner family, who has endured our shared obsession with national history and race for years. Most importantly, we thank the contributors to this book, whose essays shaped our understanding of race in history and imagination and constitute the book itself. Any errors are the responsibility of the editors alone.