This book was born out of our frustrations with academia: its institutional values and cultures, its harms, and its disconnect from the urgent issues of the real world. These frustrations have not gone away but we have learned from and alongside our participants, scholar-activist friends, and the many anti-racist scholar-activists that have gone before us, that there are contradictions in the university system that we can exploit in service to our communities of resistance. Researching and writing this book has stretched our thinking immensely and impacted upon our praxis for the better. There are many who have supported and inspired us along the way, and who have left an indelible mark on this book, hopefully transforming it beyond our initial rant to something more critical, and hopefully, more generative.

We owe our deepest gratitude to those academics and activists whom we have worked closely with in recent years. Patrick Williams and Becky Clarke in particular have been a great source of inspiration and friendship, providing examples of how to work in service to social justice. So many of our conversations with them have shaped this book in ways that are so fundamental as to be untraceable, with Patrick becoming particularly profound after several pints in Sandbar. Our dear friend Kerry Pimblott has also been an infinite source of wisdom and positivity, whose incredibly incisive thought has shaped us both as scholar-activists, and who is someone for whom we have infinite admiration. Roxy Legane, too, has taught us so much about anti-racism, resistance, and organising, and has been unwavering in her support and friendship. Born out of a shared commitment to anti-racist social justice, but becoming much more, these friendships attest to the beauty and joy that can emerge out of resistance.

We are also grateful to those that we organise alongside as part of the Northern Police Monitoring Project and Resistance Lab where we have thought collectively about what it means to ‘work in service’, and to those involved in the No Police in Schools campaign who have shown us what it means for us each to ‘struggle where you are’. We owe much to, and feel very lucky to be a part of, this powerful and growing social justice infrastructure in Greater Manchester and beyond.

We’re deeply grateful to the many friends, colleagues, and comrades who read and commented on drafts of the book’s chapters: Kerry Pimblott, Adam Elliott-Cooper, Karis Campion, Scarlet Harris, Becky Clarke, Patrick Williams, Bridget Byrne, Meghan Tinsley, Waqas Tufail, Tom Redshaw, Manny Madriaga, Carlos Frade, Chantelle Lewis, Suryia Nayak, Nadim Mirshak, Stephen Ashe, Katucha Bento, Derron Wallace, Daiga Kamerâde, and Aziz Choudry. As well as reviewing a chapter, Luke de Noronha has offered conversations that have had more impact than he might realise, and generously talked us through a crisis in confidence on the eve of submission. And thanks, too, to Ornette Clennon, who has offered guidance and mentorship throughout, and who inexplicably read a late draft of the whole book in a matter of days. This informal peer review process encapsulates much of the supportive and collegiate spirit that we suggest is integral to scholar-activism. The rigorous feedback pushed the book much further and – like our participants – challenged us on our idealised notion of scholar-activism. For this, we are incredibly thankful. And thanks to those colleagues who have supported us within our institutions, particularly Bridget Byrne, Claire Alexander, Meghan Tinsley, Karis Campion, Dharmi Kapadia, Luke de Noronha, Gaynor Bagnall, Tina Patel, and to those working elsewhere, who have continually offered support, Nadena Doharty in particular.

Shout-out to Jas Nijjar, Tanzil Chowdhury, and Leon Sealey-Huggins who have all inspired and supported us. And thanks from Remi, to those at the Racial Justice Network, with whom he learnt lots about anti-racist activism. Thanks to Laura and Oliver for their precious friendship. And thank you to the many activists and scholars, unnamed here, but with whom we have shared comradeship along the way.

A huge thank you goes to our families: to our parents, Christiana, Gary, Dawn and Rob; to Granda Norman, Grandma Dot, Nanna Flo, and Nanna Mu; to India, Talia, Rach, Anna, Jamie, Damo, and Ian; and to Archie and Sunny who have made the last few years of our lives so special. It’s difficult to put into words how much we owe, love, and value you all.

Thanks, ultimately, to our participants whose insights and wisdom have fundamentally shaped the book, and our praxis, and to those many anti-racist scholar-activists who have gone before us.
