Introduction

The Merchant’s Tale revolves around non-normative bodies and minds. An aging knight, Januarie, perceives his impending mortality, marries a much younger woman, douses himself with performance-enhancing spiced wine, and, shortly thereafter, finds himself blind. Meanwhile, a young squire of the household, Damian, takes to his bed in response to lovesickness and despair. The object of his desire, Januarie’s wife May, soon declares herself pregnant; in this putative condition she climbs a tree, engages in adulterous sex, alters her husband’s view of reality, and hops back down to the ground, all apparently within a few minutes’ time.

Disability studies serves as a useful focal point for considering these forms of “embodied variance” and perceiving survivorship strategies depicted in the poem.

Even as the tale’s main characters disregard ethical, artistic, and religious values, they provide intriguing case studies in resiliency and flexibility.

Critical responses to the Merchant’s Tale often refer to what Derek Pearsall has succinctly called the tale’s “nastiness” (l. 165). A combination of factors create this impression, including the Merchant’s extended, negative descriptions of Januarie’s body and behavior, the decidedly unromantic sexual encounter between the young lovers, and the absence of any moral compass among the tale’s main characters. Moreover, the tale’s awkward combination of genres and echoes of other pilgrims’ tales make it difficult to connect with the Merchant himself or to revel in Chaucer’s literary artistry. In fact, the tale explicitly mocks this kind of aesthetic pleasure: as seen below, no sooner has Januarie evoked the Song of Songs in a (incongruously) lyrical invitation to May than the Merchant curtly derides the “olde, lewde wordes” of the speech (l. 757).

It is precisely this rejection of idealism, however, that establishes common ground between the Merchant’s Tale and disability studies. Many disability theorists have emphasized the potential for visions of human perfection to erase, dehumanize, or patronize individuals perceived as falling short of these standards. As Lennard Davis writes, Western culture has tended to privilege “a notion of wholeness, order, clean boundaries, as opposed to fragmentations, disordered bodies, [and] messy boundaries” (143). What we define as beautiful often relies upon strictly regulated modes of representation and choices of subject matter. Davis points out, for example, that sculptural depictions of nude bodies exclude “normal biological processes...there are no pregnant Venuses, there are no paintings of Venuses who are menstruating, micturating, defecating...there are no old Venuses” (l. 132). The Merchant’s Tale, by contrast, graphically depicts aging, copulation, and other “unmentionable” human experiences. Equally important, these moments emerge not as monstrous aberrations, but as part and parcel of everyday life. When May reads Damian’s note in the privy, the Merchant describes the site as the place where “ye woot that every wight hath nede” (l. 557). Everyone’s body takes part in undignified processes, and everyone knows it. Crucially, this part of the tale highlights the possibilities inherent in the unseemly aspects of human experience. The privy provides May with a space to consider alternatives to her legally binding and repressive marriage.

We should acknowledge, of course, that May does not seem to engage in profound moral reflection as she reads Damian’s note. Minds and hearts in the Merchant’s Tale are no more reliable or transcendent than bodies. For example, the Merchant notes early on that “love is blind al day” (l. 206), an assertion that foreshadows Januarie’s physical loss of eyesight later in the tale. In most contexts, this saying associates visual impairment with powerful emotions that override social conventions or rational self-interest. It is difficult, however, to attribute any kind of emotional or spiritual authenticity to Januarie’s infatuation with May, or to May’s relationship with Damian. Instead of expressing inner truths, these characters’ decisions emerge via the interplay between internal urges and external stimuli. Far from a thunderbolt of desire, Januarie’s choice of May results from a gradual (“day to day”) activity of “heigh fantasye and curious bisinesse” that impresses itself upon his soul (ll. 185–87). Similarly, the Merchant makes clear that he does not know whether May’s feelings for Damian result from “destinee,” “aventure,” or some other cause (ll. 575–84), but he does explain that her heart has “taken swiche impression” of Damian that she resolves to take action (l. 586). In both instances, the protagonists’ choices reflect haphazard “impressions” rather than conscious thought or emotional connection. Their minds are as susceptible as the “warm wex” that is invoked by Januarie’s expectations of a pliable wife (l. 38) and used in May’s adulterous stratagem with the garden key (l. 725).

Cognitive vulnerability plays a crucial role in the tale’s final scene. Although May takes advantage of her husband’s blindness in order to consummate her relationship with Damian, it is Januarie’s suggestible mind that determines the tale’s eventual outcome. May’s deception exploits not just Januarie’s abrupt transition back into the sighted world, but also his anxiety about age-related cognitive impairment (“Ye maze, maze,” l. 995) and his strong desire to preserve his marriage and produce an heir. Without overstating May’s degree of liberty at the end of the tale, her actions should be connected to other Chaucerian speakers—male as well as female—in vulnerable situations who become extremely quick thinkers and adept fabricators. Drawing from her own experiences being misrepresented and manhandled within Januarie’s conjugal fantasies, May successfully manipulates her husband’s thought processes.

This is not to say that we should all ascend our own pyries—neither May nor any other character in the tale serves as a viable role model of ethical agency. But we would be equally mistaken to ignore May’s striking combination of elasticity and toughness; her ability to perceive the arbitrary meanings mapped onto bodies and minds; and her active reshaping of the story she has been forced to inhabit. Read through the lens of disability studies, the Merchant’s Tale’s value resides in its privileging of intervention over inspiration.

After lamenting the “sorwe” he has experienced in his own recent marriage, the Merchant introduces Januarie, a “worthy knyght” in Lombardy who has begun to contemplate wedlock after sixty years of bachelorhood. Having noted the praise of marriage found in many textual sources, the Merchant depicts a lengthy debate among Januarie and two friends about the institution’s costs and benefits. Januarie eventually chooses to marry and settles on a young bride named May—not by directly courting her, but by means of an odd combination of internal reflection (“heigh fantasie”) and legal maneuvering. The wedding includes all the usual formalities and festivities; but Damian, a young squire in Januarie’s household, is painfully overcome with desire for May. Unaware of this complication and fortified with wine and spices, Januarie prepares to consummate the union.

426 The bryde was broght a-bedde as stille as stoon;
And whan the bed was with the preest y-blessed,
Out of the chambre hath every wight him dressed.°
And Januarie hath faste in armes take

[Having learned of Damian’s passion for her, May takes pity on Damian and lets him know by letter that, when the occasion allows, she will fulfill his desires. Damian immediately feels better and waits humbly upon Januarie. In the meantime, Januarie decides to augment his pleasures by creating a walled garden. It is so lovely that the married gods Pluto and Proserpina take their pleasure there, along with their retinue of fairies. Januarie keeps the key to the garden on his person at all times and regularly takes advantage of its privacy to have sex with May there. As the Merchant laments below, however, Fortune presents Januarie with an unexpected challenge.]

[The Merchant turns his attention to a far corner of the garden, where Pluto and Proserpyna are discussing the events unfolding among Januarie, May, and Damian. Pluto deplores the disrespect shown to “this olde, blynde, worthy knyght” and describes May as a case study in women’s untrustworthiness. He vows that Januarie will regain his sight and learn about Damian and May’s treachery. Proserpyna, for her part, defends women against Pluto’s accusations and asserts that she will provide May with a sufficient answer once Januarie learns the truth. She notes that she herself is a woman; if she does not speak out, she will “swelle til myn herte breke.” The couple mutually decides to stop arguing with one another.]

Was no-thing bet° to make yow to see
Than strugle with a man up-on a tree.
God woor, I dide it in ful good entente.”
“Strugle!” quod he, “ye, algate° in it wente!
God yeve yow bothe on shames deeth to dyen!

He swyved° thee, I saugh it with myne yen,
And elles be I hanged by the hals!”°
“Thanne is,” quod she, “my medicyne al fals;
For certeinly, if that ye mighte see,
990 Ye wolde nat seyn thise wordes un-to me
Ye han som glimsing° and no parfit° sighte.”
“I see,” quod he, “as wel as ever I mighte,
Thonked be God! with bothe myne eyen two,
And by my trouthe, me thoughte he dide thee so.”
“Ye maze,”° maze, gode sire,” quod she,
“This thank have I for I have maad yow see;
Allas!” quod she, “that ever I was so kinde!”
“Now, dame,” quod he, “lat al passe out of minde.
Com doun, my lief,”° and if I have missayd,°
1000 God help me so, as I am yvel apayd.”°
But, by my fader soule, I wende han seyn,”°
How that this Damian had by thee leyn,°
And that thy smok had leyn up-on his brest.”
“Ye, sire,” quod she, “ye may wene as yow lest;°
But, sire, a man that waketh out of his sleep,
He may nat sodeynly wel taken keep
Up-on a thing, ne seen it parfitly,
Right so a man, that longe hath blind y-be,°
Til that he be adawed\(^o\) verraily;

First whan his sighte is newe come ageyn,

As he that hath a day or two y-seyn.

Til that your sighte y-satled be\(^o\) a whyle,

Ther may ful many a sighte yow bigyle.\(^o\)

Beth war,\(^o\) I prey yow; for, by hevene king,

Ful many a man weneth\(^o\) to seen a thing,

And it is al another than it semeth.

He that misconceyveth,\(^o\) he misdemeth.\(^o\)

And with that word she leep doun fro the tree.

This Ianuarie, who is glad but he?

He kisseth hir, and clippeth\(^o\) hir ful ofte,

And on hir wombe he stroketh hir ful softe,

And to his palays\(^o\) hoom he hath hir lad.\(^o\)

Now, gode men, I pray yow to be glad.
Thus endeth heer my tale of Ianuarie;
God blesse us and his moder Seinte Marie!

1 The text is taken from The Canterbury Tales, edited by Walter Skeat, The Complete Works of Geoffrey Chaucer, 2nd edn. (Clarendon Press, 1900). This text is in the public domain, released on July 22, 2007. I have provided the footnotes and endnotes and silently changed some instances of capitalization and punctuation where it seemed to facilitate comprehension.

3 We might compare May, for example, to Chauntecleer the rooster in the Nun’s Priest’s Tale, who escapes the fox’s jaws by conjuring up a triumphant speech the fox might make. Although less directly threatened, Jankin the squire in the Summoner’s Tale shows a quickness similar to May’s when he devises the clever interpretation of the lord’s mighty fart.

4 While Proserpina presumably helps her at this moment, May has already demonstrated through her plotting and use of multiple forms of communication that she is resourceful and clever in her own right.

5 Januarie and Damian also demonstrate this ability, albeit to a less striking extent: Januarie learns to live with his blindness (ll. 691–92), and Damian eventually picks up a penner in an attempt to do something about his lovesickness (l. 485).

7 In Greek mythology, Argus is a giant with a hundred eyes.

8 These lines evoke the biblical Song of Solomon (e.g., Song of Solomon 7:11).
