I am sincerely indebted to the many residents, practitioners, officials and friends who spent numerous hours and days in Ulaanbaatar sharing their stories of their life in the city with me. The discussions that emerged – of strategies to gain housing, of their struggles with air pollution, of disillusionment over the failure of economic growth to continue, of great leaps of faith when making decisions around property that would affect one’s life for years to come – were deeply personal and emotive ones. Such reflections crystallised larger life trajectories that spanned considerable periods of political and economic change. I am deeply grateful that those I spoke to shared these important life experiences with me, and I hope this book does them all justice in revealing the ingenuity, resourcefulness and dignity that they bring to Ulaanbaatar. Many of the people I spoke to I consider dear friends, and I will remain indebted to them all for a long time to come. Although I have anonymised the people and places discussed in this book, and so cannot thank them here by name, please know that I am sincerely grateful.

Many people have assisted me in Mongolia during fieldwork for this book. I would like to sincerely thank Ts. Uranchimeg, Seruntungalag, Batsuuri, Ingrid Plueckhahn, Christopher de Gruben and Sarnai. A sincere thank you to G. Badruun: as a member of the Emerging Subjects advisory board, and a knowledgeable person committed to finding different avenues towards urban improvement in Ulaanbaatar, I have always enjoyed our conversations about the city. A sincere thank you also to my dear friend and colleague Terbish Bayartsetseg, a social work scholar from the National University of Mongolia and Ghent University, with whom I conducted a considerable amount of collaborative research in the ger districts – none of which appears in this book directly, but which has appeared in other co-authored publications. I am forever grateful for our friendship and conversations.

A sincere thank you to T. Aldarsaikhan for our fascinating conversations and for providing feedback on the history section of the introduction to this book. Your knowledge of urban planning and perspectives on Ulaanbaatar are a true inspiration. I also wish to extend sincere thanks and gratitude to my two research assistants, B. Doljinsuren and B. Erdenezayaa, whose linguistic skills, insight and readiness to conduct ethnographic research greatly assisted with the research that underpins this book. I would like to thank Ya. Hishigsuren for assisting with interview transcriptions, and I also wish to thank the very talented Setsen Altan-Ochir for her invaluable assistance in translating several of the many interviews that I drew from for this book.

The journey of this book forms an outcome of many discussions, reflections and helpful critiques that have arisen from ongoing conversations with various people. Several sections of this book were presented as part of different kinds of reading groups, seminars and workshops, from which I received invaluable feedback at different stages of the writing process between 2016 and 2019. I would like to thank staff from the University of Melbourne’s Anthropology and Development Studies Department for providing helpful feedback when I presented a seminar paper in March 2016. In particular, I would like to thank Assoc. Prof. Monica Minnegal for her comments on customary forms of land tenure. I would also like to thank the Mongolia and Inner Asian Studies Unit (MIASU) at the University of Cambridge for kindly hosting me to give a seminar on ownership and urbanism in Ulaanbaatar in May 2018. I would like to thank UCL Bartlett School’s Development and Planning Unit (DPU) for including me in the workshop ‘Urban Vulnerabilities: Infrastructure, Health and Stigma’ held in June 2018, through which I received excellent feedback and engaged in great collaborative discussion. I would also like to thank the staff at University College London – Anthropology for having me give a seminar presentation in October 2018 during which I received invaluable feedback that prompted rich reflection.

Importantly, I would like sincerely to thank the Emerging Subjects Team at UCL Anthropology – Prof. Rebecca Empson, Dr Lauren Bonilla, Dr Dulam Bumochir and Dr Hedwig Waters – for their friendship and excellent intellectual collaborations that have formed part of the impetus and development of this book. A sincere thank you to Rebecca for her supervision and support during the four-year postdoctoral position in which this book was written. Many thanks to Bumochir for our many discussions as we co-edited a journal special issue on ‘Capitalism in Mongolia’, published in Central Asian Survey in 2018. Writing through these themes helped me to conceptualise aspects of this book in ways that I did not at first envisage. A sincere thank you to Lauren for her friendship and support and our fascinating discussions that spanned Mongolia and numerous theoretical topics. A sincere thank you to Hedwig for her friendship, discussions and for providing feedback on a chapter of this book.

Thank you to UCL Press for their support and work in bringing this book to publication. I am also indebted to two anonymous reviewers who provided invaluable feedback. A thank you to Dr Saskia Abrahms-Kavunenko for our time spent catching up while conducting fieldwork at the same time. A sincere thank you to G. Munkh-Erdene for providing feedback on a chapter of this book. A thank you also to Sanchir Jargalsaiikhan for our many discussions and musings on politics, scholarly themes and methods; your ongoing work is a true inspiration. I would also like to thank Dr Elizabeth Fox for our discussions of Ulaanbaatar and Dr Tess Altman for her friendship and support during the writing process. I would also like sincerely to thank the ‘Grupo de Ayuda Mutua’, a group of postdoctoral fellows and early career researchers at UCL Anthropology, for reading and providing feedback on chapters as well as providing invaluable moral support and friendship at the later stages of the writing process.

I would also like to thank the editorial board of the journal Inner Asia for granting me permission to include in this book ethnographic material and themes discussed in the following article:

Chapter 1 forms an expanded discussion of a blog piece posted on the UCL Emerging Subjects Blog, 16 March:

The research for this book was generously funded by the European Research Council, ERC-2013-CoG, 615785, Emerging Subjects.

Lastly, but by no means least, I wish sincerely to thank Janosch and Sascha Hoffmann for taking this journey with me.
