Introduction

1. twingles33, “Twingles Collectibles eBay Store About My Store,” eBay, 26 July 2011 (http://members.ebay.com/ws/eBayISAPI.dll?ViewItemPage&userid=twingles33). In the citations in this book, detailed information about website references is included. The constant reconfiguration of Internet representations and changes in Internet service providers make it difficult to find previously quoted material and important to chronicle the kinds of depictions that happen in Internet settings. Many Internet texts include typographical errors and unconventional forms of spelling, uppercase and lowercase typefaces, punctuation, and spacing. I have retained these formatting features in quotations and Internet references, with the exception of citations for news and journal sites. Some of the sites listed in these citations are no longer available. Others have changed and do not offer the text or images that I describe. In the references, the date listed before the URL is the “publication” date or the last time the site was viewed in the indicated format. When two dates are included, the first date points to when the current configuration of the site was initially available and the second date is the latest access date. Some versions of referenced sites can be viewed by using the Internet Archive’s Wayback Machine (Internet Archive, “Internet Archive: Wayback Machine,” 4 January 2011 <http://www.archive.org/web/web.php>).

3. Of course, some boys (and men) have a long history of playing with such toys as baby dolls and “Barbies” and their “safe” incarnation as action figures.

9. Cova and Pace, “Brand Community of Convenience Products.” According to Adam Arvidsson, who works on the history of marketing, brands are not primarily products. Brands represent particular ways to use objects, “a propertied form of life” with economic and identificatory features that are “realized in consumption.” Arvidsson, “Brands,” 244.

and Consumer-Created Communications”; Ozanne and Murray, “Uniting Critical Theory and Public Policy to Create the Reflexively Defiant Consumer.”

21. For a discussion of how values are modeled in other settings, see Andersen, “Relationship Marketing and Brand Involvement of Professionals through Web-Enhanced Brand Communities”; Cova et al., “Global Brand Communities across Borders”; and Jang et al., “The Influence of On-Line Brand Community Characteristics on Community Commitment and Brand Loyalty.”

24. Woolgar, “Configuring the User.” Some scholars have interrogated these arguments. Anne Sofie Laergran and James Stewart, who study new media settings, describe Woolgar’s theory as a mechanistic view of the user that privileges the designers’ viewpoint. For Laergran and Stewart, configuration is a more flexible and interactive process in which users contribute. In his research on geographic information systems (GIS), Nicholas Chrisman also identifies a design process in which “software shapes social relationships and is shaped by them.” People co-produce technologies when articulating the needs of cohorts, maintaining technologies after designers and producers have abandoned them, and supporting brands and devices by buying. Laergran and Stewart, “Nerdy, Trendy or Healthy?” 360. See also Chrisman, “Full Circle,” 30; Lindsay, “From the Shadows”; Parthasarathy, Building Genetic Medicine; and Schot and de la Bruheze, “The Mediated Design of Products, Consumption, and Consumers in the Twentieth Century.”
27. Thrift, “Closer to the Machine?”
38. Ingraham, “The Heterosexual Imaginary.”
42. Bell, “Pleasure and Danger”; Bell and Binnie, The Sexual Citizen; Binnie and Skeggs, “Cosmopolitan Knowledge and the Production and Consumption of Sexualized Space”; Evans, Sexual Citizenship. All of this creates an organizational (and governmental) logic in which cultural and legal conceptions of citizens are posed as neutral terms and correlated with gender and sexuality positions. Within this structure, citizens’ rights depend on proof of a common good rather than being guaranteed, and individuals are expected to be responsible for reflecting and maintaining what is morally just. For instance, in the eBay setting, the company and many members code traditional mothers as good because they are imagined to be self-disciplining and selfless, concepts that are useful to the site and its ethos.
43. In 1995, Omidyar was also supporting a biotechnology startup, a college alumni group, and a tribute to the Ebola virus on the ebay.com domain. eBay thus started as a kind of “Whatever it is”—a site with multiple and conflicting collections and positions. 53. Buycotts are political actions in which consumers actively support or oppose something through purchasing decisions. Studies of consumer citizenship and of how consumer objects and practices shape identities include Canclini, Consumers and Citizens; Daunton and Hilton, The Politics of Consumption; and Scammell, “The Internet and Civic Engagement.” While some literature on consumer citizenship identifies how individuals critically resist aspects of the market, media studies scholars also chronicle the ways media facilitate citizenship and empowerment. Henry Jenkins describes people enthusiastically engaging and recrafting media products so they address personal interests. Thus, it is no longer apt, according to him, to understand media’s and individuals’ interests as oppositional and viewers as co-opted. In a related manner, Sarah Banet-Weiser argues that women’s empowerment can be part of commercial culture. The Nickelodeon television channel exploits the commercial market of girl power and produces girl power culture. Toby Miller acknowledges the agentive aspects of consumerism but interrogates the idea that consumers are at the center of politics. Authors such as Caren Kaplan and Inderpal Grewal further address how identities, including gender, ethnicity, and consumer positions, become intertwined with national and transnational formations. See Banet-Weiser,

64. Gross, “My eBay Job.”

70. Other historical periods and practices also emphasize visuality. Earlier versions of Internet settings tended to be more text-based, although the employed fonts and layouts should be recognized as visual and as key features of the visual culture of such Internet interfaces as the web. 90. A variety of sellers use the term “eGay” to critique the site and thereby convey homophobic sentiments. erickc complains about eBay banning listings and notes that it is “Ultra-Gay of ebay.” jr10nisangel uses the term “eGay” to suggest that eBay makes errors, fails to provide sellers with explanations for canceled auctions, and is ill informed. jr10nisangel listed a car on “Egay but the morons who run it cancelled the auction for some reason known only to them.” erickc, “VooDoo Coconut ONE OF A KIND! NOTES TO CHAPTER ONE

103. In 2003, eBay added mutual feedback withdrawal. With this option, each member’s feedback score is adjusted, but the initial comments remain on the site. eBay introduced other changes to the feedback system in 2006. eBay now neutralizes feedback if members do not participate in issue-resolution processes, removes feedback given by individuals who are “indefinitely suspended within 90 days of registration” because eBay believes that they “were never truly members of the Community,” and requires “new members to complete a tutorial before leaving neutral or negative feedback” because research shows that they leave a “disproportionate amount of the total negative feedback.” In 2007, eBay added the DSR feedback options that allow individuals to score sellers on a five-point scale. Buyers can rate “Item as described,” “Communication,” “Shipping time,” and “Shipping and handling charges.” Nino, “eBay in Person: Brian Burke,” Chatter, May 2006, 2 June 2010 (http://pages.ebay.com/community/chatter/2006May/InPerson.html).

52. Elizabeth Lapovsky Kennedy and Madeline Davis, who provide an important history of butch and femme identities in the 1940s and 1950s, have disagreed with Case’s theory of butch camp and argued that “the lesbian community had no parallel to the camp culture that developed around queens in male homosexual communities, despite the fact that butch identity was constructed around being masculine but not male, and was therefore based in artifice. Although all butches can be said to be in drag, few butches performed as male impersonators. . . . No cultural aesthetic seems to have developed around male impersonation. Furthermore, camp humor and camp performers were not central to the lesbian community of this period.” Nevertheless, Lisa E. Davis describes butch drag and camp as part of the lesbian community and indicates how these performances were incorporated into clubs in New York City during the same period. For Nestle, a friend’s “butch self was not a masquerade of a gender cliché, but her final and fullest expression of herself.” These debates engage larger disagreements over whether people exist as stable identities or, as suggested by some contemporary forms of feminism, postmodernism, and my arguments in this chapter, identity is always culturally constructed and regulated. 14. For African American collectors of black Americana, buying these items can provide ways to document the past, own and rework denigrating representations, and keep such items out of the hands of white collectors who may view them quite differently. White collectors are sometimes discouraged from buying objects at black Americana shows and other events. 30. For instance, auroracw is informed that her personal ad was flagged because she did not provide enough personal information. She argues that this behavior is “rude,” that it “amounts to censorship,” and that she is “not going to cater to the needs of men looking at the ads so they can determine whether or not” she is “fat or thin enough for them.” When Edna_K posted “looking for a man who’s interested in feminism,” “looking for women . . . to start a women’s consciousness group,” and “looking for a man with respect for women,” she was flagged. This is because she is “a feminist and men on this site are threatened by that and flag” as “a way of shutting” her “up.”
