I must first honor those who lived the experiences described in this book, and those who have preserved memories of the World War II era. I am grateful to the historians, anthropologists, and other researchers, especially Indigenous scholars; to librarians and archivists; and to the people who shared their recollections for future generations. I have been able to use only a portion of the published and unpublished resources available, which contain many historical treasures.

The scope of this work has been inspired by the Bahá’í “world-embracing vision” of the oneness of humanity. Writing it, appropriately, has required the generous assistance of colleagues and friends from around the world. In completing this book, I appreciate the comments and help of University of Hawai’i Press Executive Editor Masako Ikeda, reviewer Lamont Lindstrom, and two anonymous reviewers. Readings by David Poyer (whose own novels of the modern US Navy offer much insight into war and warriors), Naia Poyer, and Robert Kelly improved the manuscript. For specific information, advice, and other support, I thank Judith A. Bennett, Robert Hitchcock, Veli-Pekka Lehtola, Anil Raman, Oula Seitsonen, Roland Thorstensson, Futuru Tsai, Taarna Valtonen, and others who spoke with me about their special knowledge of the topic, and, for institutional support, the University of Wyoming. For permissions for use of quotations, maps, photographs, and information about them, thanks to Carcanet Press, Journal of Pacific History, the Center for Pacific Islands Studies of the University of Hawai’i at Manoa, Stephan Dudeck, Robert Kelly, Robert and Sylvia May and the Kohima Educational Trust, Alaska Museum of the North (especially Mareca Guthrie), Australian War Memorial, and the Alexander Turnbull Library, National Library of New Zealand (especially Pamela Lovis).

In memory of all our families, may the trials of the past bring us to a future of greater freedom and peace.