ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

I am grateful to the many colleagues who have enriched my life as a veterinarian, especially to early collaborators in scientific research at the National Animal Disease Center: Milt Allison, Randall Cutlip, John Kluge, Janice Miller, Vince Meador, Harley Moon, Martin Van Der Maaten, and the more than thirty graduate students and visiting scientists who helped in many ways. Special thanks to the following Iowa State University faculty, whose personal interviews added so much to this volume: George Christiansen, Jarod Danielson, Robert Duncan, Heather West Greenlee, Richard Ross, and James Roth. Veterinary scientists who contributed to research on the great animal plagues include Ian Barker, University of Guelph; Bernard Easterday, University of Wisconsin; Paul Hildebrandt, U.S. Army; Tracy McNamara, formerly of the Bronx Zoo; Jack Rhyan, National Wildlife Disease Center; John Shadduck, dean emeritus, Texas A&M University; Terry Spraker, Colorado State University; and Keith Prasse and Lisa Nolan, deans at the University of Georgia.

Archival material from collections of the HathiTrust digital library, the E. A. Benbrook papers, and the Iowa State University Library Archives were essential. Timothy Horning, public services archivist at the University of Pennsylvania, was marvelously efficient in helping with the history of PennVet, and Halle Mares with the Ohio State University Archives located material on H. J. Detmers. Susanne K. Whitaker of the Rare and Manuscript Collections at the Cornell University Library provided photographs and data on James Law and the veterinary faculty. Jennifer Wiggins and Tommy Brown in Special Collections and Archives at Auburn University Libraries authenticated photos of the first veterinary class at Auburn University. Renee Ziemer, historian of the Mayo Clinic, led me on important paths to information on William Mayo as a veterinarian.

Four books by midwestern authors were critical for historical accuracy: History of Veterinary Medicine at Iowa State College, C. H. Stange, 1929, Iowa; Veterinary Military History of the United States, Louis Merillat and Delwin Campbell, Illinois, 1935; A Short History of Veterinary Medicine in America,

I am indebted to my wife, Beth, and three of our children—biochemist Anne Nelson, literacy professor Julie Cheville, and physician John Cheville—for reviewing the manuscript and steering me in the right direction. Finally, it has been my good fortune to work with Purdue University Press director Justin Race, graphic designer Chris Brannan, acquisitions assistant Susan Wegener, and senior production editor Kelley Kimm, as well as the sales and marketing staff. Collectively, their positive approach, guidance, reviews, critiques, and adaptation to the author’s foibles brought the book to its final form.
