KARL WIDERQUIST

After working on this book on and off for nine years, I’ve started to wish I’d taken notes on everybody who discussed it with me. I’ve presented bits and piece of it at a lot of seminars and conferences. Close colleagues and people I barely know have given me important feedback over these years, and I wish I could thank them all by name, but most of them will go unnamed. Thank you.

Thanks to all of my Facebook friends who listened to my thoughts on this book for nearly a decade.

The people that I can remember to thank by name include especially my wife Elizabeth and Grant’s wife Sarah, who were both very encouraging and willing to make sacrifices to make this work possible. The Preface mentioned that Elizabeth arranged the seminar where Grant and I met, and now I need to thank her for that. She also let me bounce ideas off her even though it sometimes involved tedious explanations. Thanks to my parents, my sister, and especially my brother, who became my business partner and built our business in less time than it took to write this book.

Some of my colleagues from Oxford and Reading when I was there in the mid to late 2000s gave me useful advice and encouragement when I was just getting started. These include Sara Ababneh, Chris Brooke, Dan Butt, Ian Carroll, Paula Casal, John Filling, Beatrice Heuser, Rob Jubb, Clare Haywood, Omar Khan, Kieran Oberman, Miriam Ronzoni, Ben Saunders, Stuart White, Andrew Williams, Steve Winter, and many others. About that time, while discussing another project, Michael W. Howard of the University of Maine, helped me understand that my perspective conflicts as much with contractarianism as it does with propertarianism. That discussion certainly affected how I read anthropology.

I’ve been working at Georgetown University’s School of Foreign Service in Qatar since 2009, and although I’m one of only two philosophers on staff, the entire faculty has been great about treating me like a colleague who does valuable research. I’d like to thank everyone there, especially Jeremy Koons (the other philosopher) and Sharif S. Elmusa (who arranged for me to give a public lecture on this project).

Mehran Kamrava, the director of Georgetown’s Center for International and Regional Studies, found funding for a conference on this book, and arranged for philosophers from around Europe and the Middle East to come and discuss it. I think I can name everyone this time: James Alexander, Renaud Fabbri, Bashshar Haydar, Carl Knight, David Lea, Enzo Rossi, Assaf Sharon, Anthony Squires, Lars Vinx, and Raya M. Wolfsun. Each of these people read a 100,000-word manuscript and talked about this project all day. Their feedback was so massive and so useful that it contributed to this project’s becoming a two-book series.

I am a member of the Economic Ethics Network (EEN), a group of a few dozen philosophers and political theorists who specialize in the ethical issues of economic policy. I’ve presented several pieces of this project at the EEN’s annual conference, and the feedback has been great. Thank you all.

Recently my New Orleans colleagues, Drew Chastain and Jason Bernsten, have given me useful feedback, as did all the attendees at Tulane’s symposium, Articulating Political Philosophy and Anthropological Theory, Method, and Evidence.

A partial list of people who have read and given me comments on chapters but haven’t been named elsewhere includes Jurgen De Wispeelaere, Andrew Dittmer, Joerg Drescher, Alice El-Wakil, Anca Gheaus, Jason Hickel, Gillian Ice, Stephen Kershnar, Sean Mitchell, Ben Mord, Viggo Nightbay, Gaura Rader, Brent Renalli, Mark Walker, and many more whose names I should have written down.

I would like to thank Anton Leist, the editor of Analyse & Kritik, whose critical comments on our précis of this book greatly improved our clarity. Also, an anonymous referee from that journal who gave us the single best review I’ve ever received or ever expect to receive in my life and helped me to understand the significance of our refutation of what we call “the violence hypothesis.”
And a special apology to everyone else I should have named but haven’t.

GRANT S. McCALL

There are many people that need thanking for their help on this project; more than I will be able thank here, I’m afraid. Above all, my wife, Sarah McCall, has suffered my distraction in working on this book, and my other forms of foolery, with a smile (mostly). Next, my parents, George McCall and Nancy Shields, have loved and supported me in all of my work over the years. In addition, you will find both of them featured prominently in literature cited in this book. Their influence is never far from what I do and that is as true here as anywhere.

There have also been many colleagues with whom I have had important conversations about the work presented here. Among my Tulane colleagues that have helped me on this project are Marcello Canuto, Trent Holliday, Tatsuya Murakami, Jason Nesbitt, and Chris Rodning. I’m especially grateful to Mary Townsend, who joined me in organizing the Articulating Political Philosophy and Anthropological Theory, Method, and Evidence symposium, as well as the other participants, Drew Chastain, Osman Nemli, and Christopher Quintana. Discussion among all of the participants in this symposium helped me sharpen my thinking on subjects discussed in this book. Finally, to echo what Karl has said above, there are innumerable people with whom I’ve discussed this project in conversations that I can’t recall now. For all such anonymous help, I’m enormously grateful and sad that I can’t thank everyone by name.
