Ambiguous Citizenship in an Age of Global Migration

Ní Mhurchú, Aoileann

Published by Edinburgh University Press

Ní Mhurchú, Aoileann.
Ambiguous Citizenship in an Age of Global Migration.
Project MUSE. muse.jhu.edu/book/64181.

For additional information about this book
https://muse.jhu.edu/book/64181

For content related to this chapter
https://muse.jhu.edu/related_content?type=book&id=2380519
Acknowledgements

I would like to acknowledge the following mentors, colleagues and friends who have helped make this book possible. At Dublin City University (DCU) I would like to thank Ronaldo Munck and Ken McDonagh for their belief in the project upon which it is based and for giving so much of their time for advice, support and critical engagement towards my ideas; John Doyle for professional advice and encouragement as head of department; Maura Conway and Karen Devine for encouragement and support; James Fitzgerald, Mary Hyland and Gloria Macri for valued friendships and for provocative discussions about identity, poststructuralism and the meaning of life in general! At the International Politics Department at Aberystwyth University I benefited hugely from discussions and often also important friendships with Jenny Edkins, Andy Hom, Katherine Jones, Gillian McFadyen, Reiko Shindo and Marie Suetsugu. Outside DCU and Aberystwyth University my heartfelt thanks go to R. B. J. Walker, Peter Nyers, Anne McNevin, Angharad Closs Stephens and Caítríona Ní Laoire for their intellectual and professional generosity over the past few years.

I have been very lucky recently to have found great colleagues and an exceptional intellectual environment in the University of Manchester. Thanks are extended to all the members of the Politics Concours Collegium (PoCCo) and the Political Horizons group, which have provided stimulating spaces for discussion, collegiality and friendship – in particular to Elena Barabantseva, Richard Child, Emmanuel-Pierre Guittet, Cristina Masters, Véronique Pin-Fat, Liam Shields, Gabriel Siles-Brügge, Maja Zehfuss and Andreja Zevnik.

Thanks are due to the team at Edinburgh University Press for Ambiguous Citizenship

ten

their help on seeing this project through to completion, and two anonymous reviewers for their valuable comments. Also to Priya Chohan for allowing me to use her poem in the book and her beautiful image for the cover design.

Lastly, I owe a huge debt to my family and friends. My parents have enabled, supported and encouraged my education. I can never thank them enough for this, and for never expecting me in return to ‘be’ anything in particular, apart from happy. To Carl – for always being there and making life so much fun.

This book is dedicated to my grandmother Peig Uí Mhurchú (1915–2012) and the people who helped us take care of her for so many years. Many of the original ideas for chapters were drafted at her kitchen table and she never tired of asking me how my ‘big book’ was coming along. A wonderfully kind woman with a razor sharp wit that had to be heard to be believed! She is sorely missed by us all. Ní beith a leithéid ann arís.

Parts of this book have appeared elsewhere at earlier stages in the project and I would like to acknowledge these publications as follows:

• Elements of Chapter 2 which outline existing analysis of the 2004 Irish Citizenship Referendum along with elements of Chapter 1 which consider an alternative way of approaching the politics of citizenship were published as ‘Thinking Citizenship and Its Constitutive Subject: Interrogating the 2004 Irish Citizenship Referendum Debate’, Citizenship Studies 15(2), 2011, pp. 161–80.

• Part of the discussion in Chapter 3 along with my argument in Chapter 6 regarding two diverging approaches to dealing with the crisis of sovereignty were published as ‘Citizenship as Absolute Space, Citizenship as Contingent Trace’, Alternatives: Global, Local, Political 35(4), 2010, pp. 373–401.

• Finally, parts of Chapter 4 which consider examples of less-than state sovereign experiences of citizenship in Ireland are based on the article ‘Beyond a “Realistic” New Cosmopolitan Ideal in the Irish Context: A Non-Sovereign Politics of Solidarity’, Translocations: Migration and Social Change 6(2), 2010.

Manchester
August 2013