Acknowledgments

I would like to thank the editors of Americana: The E-Journal of American Studies in Hungary for their kind permission to revise and reprint my article “Situating Dewey,” published in the fall 2007 issue of the journal, Volume III, Number 2 (http://americanaejournal.hu/vol3no2/morse).

Many thanks go to Mark Johnson for his philosophical inspiration. While he may not agree with all of my findings in this book, I hope he will understand my motivation for writing it: I owed a debt to Dewey that I had to repay. In a future work, I intend to repay my other major intellectual debt and to investigate the merits of continuity. I owe special thanks to the two reviewers of the manuscript for their comments and suggestions. I have especially benefitted from the deep insights and kind encouragement of Scott Pratt, whom I would like to thank heartily, particularly for his suggestions regarding the relation between unity and disunity. I am grateful to Martin Coleman for making me aware of an important letter by Dewey, and to Webster University for making it possible for me to teach in Vienna and to research the history of the modernist tradition there. In addition, I am grateful to Ann Miller for her skillful editing throughout the text, to Eric Newman for his kindness and editorial expertise, and to the staff at Fordham University Press in general for making the publication of this work such a smooth process.

I am especially grateful to Kim Novak Morse, whose patience is remarkable; whose keen intellect is enviable; who encouraged me every step of the way, offered valuable suggestions, and, above all, showed me the meaning of courage.

In accord with this formal determination, spirit can abstract from all that is external and even from its own externality, its determinate being. It can endure the negation of its individual immediacy, the infinite pain, that is, in this negativity it can maintain itself affirmatively and be identical for itself.
